A MANUAL OF PLAINSONG

FOR DIVINE SERVICE

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED THE PSALTER NOTED

TO GREGORIAN TONES

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainsong, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendices to the Psalter: and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainsong. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy: and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainsong during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution: on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science: it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion: but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

The Canticles noted to Gregorian Tones, together with the Litany and Responses from the above, 1s. Net.

ADDITIONAL HYMNS WITH TUNES

FOR USE WITH

HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN OR ANY OTHER CHURCH HYMNAL.

272 pages, Imperial 16mo. Cloth Boards, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Tonic Sol-fa Edition, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Hymns only, Imperial 32mo, Cloth Boards, One Shilling.

Hymns only, medium 32mo, diamond type, cloth, 4d. ; paper, 3d.

Complete edition, bound with HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN (Quarto), 6s. 6d. net.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

THE FINEST COLLECTION OF VOCAL METHODS

PERFECTION IN SINGING CAN ONLY BE ATTAINED BY A GOOD METHOD.

What, then, is the best method to use for teaching singing?

To this we unhesitatingly reply—

“THE OLD ITALIAN METHOD.”

Rossini said, “Whoever sings in the Italian way sings all his life long”; in other words, the voices of those taught on that method appear young and fresh even in old age.

It gives by far the best results; it cultivates the “bel Canto,” that is, the production of beautiful, full, pure tone.

ALL THE WORLD'S GREATEST VOCALISTS HAVE BEEN TRAINED ON IT.

Messrs. G. RICORDI & Co. have issued a Series of VOCAL TUTOR, SOLFEGGI, EXERCISES, &c., selected from the works of the most celebrated Italian Teachers, and published at a very moderate price under the title of “RICORDI'S SPECIAL EDITION.”

In issuing these books the chief aim of the compilers was to accustom students from the very beginning to those principles which would prepare them for the perfect execution of Modern Music, applying however to the Studies the traditions of the old school of Italian Singing.

The books are well printed, and for general all-round beauty and excellence will be found admirable in every respect. Indications are given for breathing, phrasing, and expression, and the metronome time of each number is marked.

Used at the Royal Academy of Music, the Royal College of Music, the Guildhall School of Music, and by all the traditions of Professors of Singing everywhere.

When ordering these Vocal Works SEE THAT YOU GET THE EDITION WITH THE “RED COVER.”

THEY ARE THE BEST.

THEY ARE THE CHEAPEST.

[“No English-speaking country or colony with so much as a solitary musical society is unacquainted with the music of Mr. Gaul.”—Birmingham Daily Gazette and Express, April 11, 1910.]

MR. GAUL will be pleased to forward to the Colonies or any foreign country the Orchestral Parts (on loan) of any of his works.

COMPOSITIONS BY ALFRED R. GAUL

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SEVENTH THOUSAND.

1. THE HOLY CITY.

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

2. THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

“Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music.”

—Newcastle Journal.

“The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen.”—London Daily Telegraph.

“Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole.”

“Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the ‘Holy City,’ ‘Joan of Arc,’ and ‘The Ten Virgins.’”—Newcastle Daily Journal.

“BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to enquire every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole.”

—The Musical Times.

“That ‘The Ten Virgins’ is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite ‘Holy City’ we have no doubt whatever.”—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Produced with great success by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. FORTIETH THOUSAND.

3. JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA
FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

“Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul’s ‘Joan of Arc,’ performed by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall.”—The Western News.

“Must enhance the high reputation of its composer.”—Liverpool Courier.

“The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than ‘The Holy City.’”—Huddersfield Examiner.

“No more charming Cantata than ‘Joan of Arc’ could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it.”—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

“Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic.”—Bradford Observer.

“The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than ‘Joan of Arc.’”—Western Times.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. TWENTY-FOURTH THOUSAND.

4. PASSION SERVICE

(Only published in Vocal Score)

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

“The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct scenes. The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: ‘The Traitor at the Table,’ ‘The Denial,’ ‘The Condemnation before Pilate,’ ‘The Mockery on Calvary,’ ‘The Shadow of Death,’ and ‘The Holy Sepulchre.’ Mr. Gaul’s work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition.”—Musical Standard.

“Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success.”—Sheffield Independent.

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

5. THE PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE.

“No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneity, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm.”—Birmingham Daily Gazette.
“Is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthy the study of Choral Societies of every grade.”—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

“There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment.”—Pontypool Free Press.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

6. ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

(Only published in Staff Notation and Tonic Sol-fa.)

“We welcome ‘Israel in the Wilderness’ as one of those works which foster the love and induce the practice of music amongst the people.”—Musical Standard.

“The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the composer’s direction, and very warmly received.”—Standard.

“Effective without presenting any overwhelming difficulties. The part writing is excellent. . . . Melodious throughout.”—Daily News.

“Likely to become quite as great a favourite with choral societies as ‘The Holy City.’”—Daily Chronicle.

“Altogether worthy of the composer of that amazingly popular work, ‘The Holy City.’”—The Referee.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. NINTH THOUSAND.

7. UNA

CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

“Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious, tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul’s work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the ‘Holy City’ and other works.”—Putney Borough News.

“Mr. Gaul’s music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody.”—Manchester Examiner.

“Mr. Gaul’s choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for.”—Leeds Mercury.

“To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, ‘Una’ should be added.”—Athenaeum.

“Choral societies have long shown that Mr. Gaul is a composer whom they are glad to accept. ‘Una’ will find its way amongst them easily.”—Daily Telegraph.

A VALUABLE BOOK FOR TEACHERS AND STUDENTS.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED
BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

THE present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

Competition Festival Record

No. 62.

A Myth? In our April number we quoted from The Choir (for March) a statement that 'it is a fact that some choirmasters and soloists prepare their music [for competitions] not in accordance with the composer's intentions so much as to suit the known vagaries and preferences of the adjudicators for the time being.' We stated that we did not believe that this charge could be substantiated by evidence, and after pointing out that if the charge were true it would be easy to describe in writing the so-called vagaries of the implicated adjudicators, we invited the conductors concerned to be good enough to describe in detail the various ways of preparing a part-song ('O happy eyes' by Elgar was named) to meet the views (divergent as they must be on the theory) of certain well-known adjudicators who were named. Further, we asked the Editor of The Choir to assist in the quest.

No reply from any source has been vouchsafed. We cannot affect to be disappointed, because we think no rational reply was possible. There the matter might have rested but, unfortunately, the statement made in The Choir was quoted by the Daily Telegraph, and therefore given wide circulation, to the detriment of the movement and the reputation of adjudicators. Next, Mr. Rutland Boughton comes as a sort of witness of the hearsay description. In a pamphlet entitled 'The Death and Resurrection of the Musical Festival' (W. Reeves), in which there is a good deal of sense and truth regarding adjudicating, he says: 'Indeed, one trainer of successful choirs told me that he always prepared his singers and music with a view to pleasing those adjudicators whose idiosyncrasies he had learned.'

This again was quoted by Mr. Robin H. Legge in the Daily Telegraph as a confirmation of the former statement in The Choir. We requested Mr. Boughton to give us the name of the 'trainer of successful choirs' who had worked on these odd lines, but he declined to do so. Whether this will reach the eye of this clever conductor we cannot say, but we trust we shall hear from him. There is no good reason for secrecy. Some of us who adjudicate would like very much to know what are supposed to be our exclusive fads.

We invite attention to the following questions and considerations:

1. How does a conductor know beforehand who is to adjudicate in the class for which he is preparing? The Blackpool Festival will be held in about six weeks. None of the judges know yet to which classes they will be allotted. As a rule at the great Festivals they know only a week or two before the event.

2. Then at all these Festivals the choral sections are judged by two, three, and sometimes even four adjudicators working together. The vagary-preparation conductor must be perplexed to the point of suicide in such cases.

3. On the theory advanced, each adjudicator has a vagary or idiosyncrasy that is not shared by any other adjudicator. Therefore, if you prepare for Mr. Harry Evans you are dished if Dr. McNaught turns up in his stead. But perhaps four or five styles are got up, and the conductor whispers to his choir—'à la Evans' or 'à la McNaught,' and he conducts accordingly. Clever man! But if there are three adjudicators, there would be considerable difficulty in hitting upon, say, a Walford-McEvans or a Bairstock-Price-Noble blend.

4. Ten choirs sing, say, at Blackpool. Their styles are certain to differ greatly; that is the constant experience. So at least nine of them have failed to agree as to the vagaries of the adjudicators appealed to!

5. Does any sane person suppose that Mr. Nesbitt of the Manchester Orpheus, Mrs. Bourne of the Barrow Choir, Mr. Whittaker of the Blackpool Madrigal Society, Mr. Clifford Higgin of the Blackpool Orpheus, Mr. Aldous of the Lancaster Choir, or Mr. Hitchon of the Habergham Choir have really prepared their universally acknowledged superb performances by studying the vagaries and idiosyncrasies of adjudicators? Surely they one and all give us their own self-expression, their own wonderful and uplifting interpretations!

How often it has been that one or other of the above-named conductors has given the most experienced adjudicators a lesson in interpretation. How willingly have these adjudicators acknowledged their indebtedness. Did Mr. John James of the Hanley Choir trouble himself about adjudicators' vagaries when at Morecambe he moved so many to tears by a never-to-be-forgotten performance of Cornelius's 'O death, thou art the tranquil night'? Sir Edward Elgar, Mr. Frederick Corder, Dr. Sinclair, and Dr. McNaught were in the box.

Whose vagaries was Mr. Clifford Higgin thinking of when at Lytham his Ladies' Choir transfixed an audience by a performance of Berlioz's 'Ophelia'? Mr. Whittaker has given us all many thrills during the last decade. Did Mr. Roderick Williams, the conductor of the Cardiff Choir at the Abergavenny Eisteddfod (reported in another column) think of anything but the 'vagaries and idiosyncrasies' of Bach when he led the glorious performance of the Motet, 'The Spirit also helpeth us'? It would be extremely interesting to Mrs. Bourne's male adjudicators to know which of them she most cottons to! No greater compliment could be paid to any adjudicator than for him to be told that all the splendid interpretations referred to above were a mere giving way to his 'vagaries and idiosyncrasies.' If it be so, then let us pray that his influence will extend from John o' Groat's House to Land's End, and include the Daily Telegraph, The Choir, and Mr. Rutland Boughton.

THE ROYAL NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD OF WALES.—August 4-9.

Abergavenny, the 'Gate of Wales,' has long been honourably associated with the Eisteddfod, and the decision of the National Eisteddfod Association to hold the 1913 meeting there aroused the keenest interest amongst Eisteddfodwyr. No town has had greater Eisteddfodic experience, and the annual Easter meeting, with its long unbroken record, is one of the most important gatherings in the Principality. It is interesting to record that it was at Abergavenny that the late Mr. John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia), the royal harpist, won his first prize for playing the triple harp, at the same time attracting the attention of Countess Lovelace (Byron's only daughter), who secured his admission to the Royal Academy of Music.

The House of Llanover has always been to the fore in the encouragement of art, and a most interesting feature of this year's Eisteddfod was the Band of Triple Harpists formed under the influence of the late Hon. Mrs. Herbert, of Llanover.

The issue of the syllabus, it will be remembered, occasioned much disappointment on account of its retrograde character, and the resignation of Prof. Bantock, who refused to act as adjudicator unless the chief choral test at least was altered, caused much excitement and discussion. The committee refused to alter the 'St. Paul' test, which had already done service ten years ago at Llanelly, but a compromise was made by the addition of a new choral class, the Supreme Merit Class, and on the advice of Dr. Walford Davies, who was appointed in place of Prof. Bantock, the Bach motet for double chorus, 'The Spirit also helpeth us,' was selected as test-piece. It will be seen that this proved a wise solution of the difficulty as well as the vindication of Prof. Bantock's attitude. The tests in nearly all the choral classes were below the standard expected at the National Eisteddfod, whilst some of the vocal solo tests were of the most hackneyed type, and had already served at innumerable small competitions!

A commodious structure, estimated to seat 14,000 people, had been erected amidst beautiful surroundings in Bailey Park, and the acoustics were quite satisfactory. The first Eisteddfod meeting was held on Tuesday, August 5. Adjudicators were at the preliminary competitions at 8 a.m., and by the time the chief choral competition was reached, there was the usual great audience plus the excitement that prevails only at the 'National.' The judges had selected two numbers from 'St. Paul' that morning—(a) the chorale, 'To Thee, O Lord,' and (b) the chorus, 'Rise up, arise'—thus affording ample contrast. Most of the choirs failed to phrase the chorale, and never was there a more striking instance of the prevalent failing of choirs to sing whole musical phrases. The musical phrase was sacrificed to verbal expression, the comma was an obstacle, and exaggerated expression was the inevitable result. Eleven choirs had entered, and of these eight appeared. Some delay and a little confusion occurred before the first choir sang. The leader of the orchestra, in excited tones, addressed the judges, and wanted to know from them whether the whole orchestra were to play, and if so, who was to pay them! The obvious reply came from the box that the matter was one for the committee to decide, and that the condition was that the choirs be accompanied by a full orchestra. Another speech was made by the conductor of the first choir, who was in doubt as to whether his choir could risk beginning at the Tutti in the opening symphony, since all the players were not quite certain of the starting point. This was reasonable enough, but the speeches could have been avoided by the simple expedient of despatching a steward to the judges' box! Some unfortunate newspaper correspondence that ensued has not helped the dignity of the occasion.

The prizes in the Chief Choral Class were £150 and £50. The choirs' sang in the following order:

Aberaman Institute Choral Society.—(a.)—The tone was good, and the intonation secure. The comma was a stumbling block. There was not a single complete phrase, the rhythmic flow was disturbed, and there were many gaps. The attack near the close was not precise. There was great earnestness in the utterance, but they missed the calm, subdued resignation.

(b.)—The rhythm of the opening phrase was not exact. There was splendid energy and spirited attack. The fugue subject was unnecessarily detached. The tonality was a little vague in the modulations, and there was a jauntiness that was not in keeping with the subject. The basses were a little inaccurate, and the singing after letter G got so feverish that the pitch was forced up, and from here to the end the rhythm became loose, though there was abundant vitality throughout.

Rhondda Choral Society.—(a.)—The tone was sympathetic and musical, but again there was the fault of breaking up the musical phrase, though the gaps were not so evident as in the previous choir's performance. An extra pause was inserted—not with any ill effect. The closing phrase was beautifully sung, and some of the mood was realised.

(b.)—The opening was exultant and dignified, but later there was a loss of gravity. They did not successfully achieve a climax at the end of the first section, and the tenors did not deliver the fugue subject with confidence. The development flagged a little, and the interest was not sustained. The soprano theme was dignified and significant. The pitch rose slightly, and some of the phrases were not neatly quitted. The piling up of the final climax was well managed.

Cardiff Harmonic Society.—(a.)—The tone was excellent in quality and well unified. The basses were a trifle light. There was a slight gap in the first phrase, and the singing might have been more subdued; but there was a gravity and solemnity in the treatment, and there was no exaggeration. The crescendo was well controlled, and the diction throughout was first-rate. The concluding phrase was beautifully sung, the utterance of the word 'content' being specially expressive.

(b.)—The pace was a trifle deliberate, and consequently some of the exultation was missed, but the singing was dignified and well controlled. The fugue was clear and well defined, if a little stolid. The tenors greatly distinguished themselves; they were a rare body of singers, and the sopranos ran them close by their confident, ringing tone. The deliberate pace was suited to the last section beginning with the soprano phrase, 'But upon thee,' &c., and the final section made a striking climax as well-controlled, resonant, and dignified tone.

Bedling United Choir.—(a.)—The tone required greater resonance. The opening phrase was again detached, and there was some unnecessary gliding by the sopranos. The singers were expressing single words instead of whole phrases, and the sudden spurts of tone were out of place. The pronunciation needed attention.

(b.)—There was abundant energy and good intention in the opening phrases, but the singing became feverish, the rhythm monotonous, and there was a want of cohesion. The enthusiasm compelled admiration, though it led them astray in the matter of intonation. When this enthusiasm is controlled this choir should do well. At present the music is rather chopped up, and there is too much percussion on the edge of the note, which prevents full sustenance of the tone.

Pontypridd Philharmonic Society.—(a.)—Good, resonant, and well-balanced tone. The pace was too deliberate. The first phrase was again unnecessarily detached and delayed, and the effect was laboured. There was very good intention on the expressive side, but over-anxiety caused exaggeration of details.

(b.)—The pace was well chosen, and the opening was promising; but the final big chords in the phrases were not neatly quitted. The utterance was not uniformly crisp, and the attack was only occasionally alert. The academic portion of the chorus tempted the singers to slackness in the rhythmic treatment, and the big cumulative phrase, 'The glory of the Lord,' was allowed to slide along. The tone of the choir was always good, but there was not much vitality in the singing.

Rhymney Gwent Choral Society.—(a.)—Very good, sympathetic tone. The pace was slow, and the phrasing detached. The sopranos and altos were a little below the pitch, and the expression was more verbal than musical. The utterance was earnest, there was atmosphere, and the tone-colour in the closing phrase was beautiful.

(b.)—A vigorous and brilliant opening at the right pace, though they seemed to expend too much force in the opening phrases. A splendid climax was built up at the close of the first section. The alto tone deteriorated later, and lacked mellow quality. The rallentando introduced before letter G was unnecessary, and temporarily stopped the rhythmic flow, besides making an anti-climax. It was a very good thing gone suddenly wrong. The rallentando at the close was excessive, but there were splendid energy and fire in the delivery of these big phrases, and there was the exultation that thrilled.

Troedyrhiw Philharmonic Society.—(a.) Though the pace was slow, the phrasing slightly detached, and the crescendo a little exaggerated, this was the most impressive singing. It was subdued and tender, there was more continuity, and it was beautifully expressive, the close being quite touching.

(b.)—The opening was bright and vigorous, and at the right pace, whilst there was an exhilarating rhythmic swing. There was a tendency to clip the ends of phrases, and the fugue became mechanical and forced in pitch. There was not enough vocal resource for big expansion. The treatment became disjointed and a little spasmodic in the big phrases, and unfortunately the intonation got seriously wrong. There was splendid enthusiasm, but it was ungoverned.

Treharris and District Harmonic Society.—(a.) Though the tone was good, the attack was indefinite, the movement not precise, and the utterance rather unsympathetic. There were gaps again, also a lack of fluency, and the tender, subdued, resigned mood was not remotely suggested.

(b.)—There were some technical defects, and an unfortunate mishap by the sopranos nearly spelt disaster. The judges expressed their regret at this misfortune, and sympathised with the conductor. The singers ultimately recovered themselves, but were never quite happy. The subdued treatment of one phrase was ineffective and irrelevant. The fugue lacked definite rhythmic accent, and the big phrase, 'The Glory of the Lord,' was excessively drawn out. The climax was vigorous and broad, and the tone was always good.

* First Prize. † Second prize.

The result was not made known until after the Supreme Merit Competition, which took place after a short interval. Four of the above choirs had entered, and the prize was a silver trophy valued at £70. There were no money-prizes.

Aberaman.—The tone was smooth and the style restrained, but the two choirs were not adjusted properly to secure the right antiphonal effect. Some of the time-values were not exact, otherwise the execution was good, and the singing was entirely free from the exaggeration which marred this choir's singing of the 'St. Paul' choruses. There was not enough resource for the climaxes, and the difficult endings of the first and second movements were not successfully negotiated. The fugue lacked majesty and continuity, but the chorale was given with greater security and comfort. 75 marks.

Cardiff.—Beautiful tone was evident at the opening, and the two choirs were well-matched. The singing was flexible, fluent, the antiphony remarkably good, and the tapering and dovetailing of the phrases were beautifully controlled. Nothing could be finer. There was the control that enabled them to expand with great effect in the finely-spread cadences. There was gravity in the utterance, a noble security in the rhythm, and both technique and tone were of the finest. There was a slightly tired feeling in the closing phrases of the chorale, but this was a remarkably fine performance, worthy of the highest traditions of choral singing and of the noble music sung. 97 marks.

Rhymney Gwent.—A solid tone and a strong, rhythmic feeling marked the opening phrases. But the two choirs were not so successfully adjusted for the antiphonal effects as in the previous performance. The runs were a little gay, though there was splendid vitality, but there was not the gravity and dignity of the previous choir. The technique was very good, and they scored by their intense singing of the chorale, which quite carried the audience. In many ways it was a splendid performance. 93 marks.

Pontypridd.—The tone was pleasant and successfully distributed. The pace was slow, and caused some languid effect. The antiphony was only partially successful. The intonation was very good, and there was good technique, but though it was a courageous effort, they never moved the listener, and were only comfortable in the chorale, which was given with dignity. 80 marks.

The Cardiff choir were thus double winners, and it is probably the most striking feature of this year's Eisteddfod that the singing of the difficult Bach music reached a higher level than the singing of the comparatively simple and well-known Mendelssohn music. This was a most significant experience, and ought to have great influence upon the future work of Welsh choirs, and incidentally upon Eisteddfod committees. It almost seemed like the slaying of Mendelssohn, the beloved of Welsh choirs, but probably no one would have been more pleased with the triumph of Bach than Mendelssohn himself had he been present.

The Cardiff choir won the chief choral prize at the Swansea National Eisteddfod in 1907, and the male department had previously distinguished themselves by winning the chief male-voice choir prize at the Rhyl National Eisteddfod in 1904. Though not essentially a competitive choir, they have frequently competed and secured important prizes, but ill-luck has followed them in the National (since 1909) until this year.

The choir is in rehearsal practically all the year round, and has done consistently good service by the production of complete works twice a year. Its repertoire includes Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion, Brahms's 'Requiem,' Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' in addition to the Handel and Mendelssohn oratorios. Mr. Roderick Williams, the conductor, is a business man who devotes all his spare time to music, and has conducted both the mixed and male choirs from their inception.

The chief events in Wednesday's programme were the children's choirs and the ladies' choral competitions, neither of which reached the highest standard as a whole. Eleven of the twelve juvenile choirs appeared. The tests were: (a) 'A bird song' (Rogers), (b) 'Merry June' (Vincent). The Nottingham Prize Choir (Mr. Turner) were clearly first, and won the prize of £10 with 186 marks.

Tabernacle Llanelly ran them closely, and got the second prize of £5 with 185 marks. An anonymous donor presented additional prizes of £3 and £2, and these were awarded to Cor Lett, Aberdare (182 marks) and Brynaman (179 marks). The remaining choirs were :

Gladstone Road, Barry	177
Canton, Cardiff... ..	170
Garndiffaith	170
Morleisiad	165

The tests in the Ladies' Choir Competition were: (a) 'The Pixies' (Coleridge-Taylor) and (b) 'Hail to thee' ('The bride of Dunkerron, Smart). Ten choirs had entered, and of these seven appeared. The prize-winners stood out clearly by reason of superior tone and equipment. The Carmarthen Ladies' Choir won the prize of £20, and their singing of the first piece was distinguished by charming rhythmic treatment. The big chord was disappointing, and the climax was inadequate. They gave quite a beautiful performance of the second piece. Tredegar were a good second, and gave an admirable performance of the first piece, excellent in tone, and subtle in its rhythmic treatment, but they fell off considerably in the second piece, which became mechanical. The marks were :

Glantawe	76 + 82 = 158
Ynysddu	77 + 85 = 162
Swansea	74 + 87 = 161
Tredegar	93 + 84 = 177
Mr. Turner's Choir	78 + 83 = 161
Carmarthen	87 + 94 = 181
Barry	79 + 92 = 171

There was an uncommonly large entry of fifteen choirs for the second choral competition on Thursday, and of these thirteen appeared. It has long been felt that the Eisteddfod should encourage choirs of this size (60 to 80 voices) rather than the very large choirs of 200 voices. Unfortunately the standard of singing by these smaller choirs is as yet not of a high order, with few exceptions, and the repertoire is very limited. But the material is there in great abundance, and competent conductors will be forthcoming, provided that Eisteddfod committees will exercise discretion in the choice of music. The test-pieces were (a) 'Yr Ynys Wen' (Isle of Beauty), by J. H. Roberts. It is an effective enough piece, in simple style, and has been used for many years in competitions. The other piece was the big and not too interesting chorus from Handel's 'Jephtha' ('Theme sublime'). This was hardly a suitable test, and resulted in much forced tone and misplaced energy. The splendid English madrigals, along with the modern part-songs, are practically closed books to these choirs, and it is devoutly hoped that since there are so many small choirs in South Wales they will devote themselves to the study of the best unaccompanied music. There is a great field before these Welsh choirs, and there should be a great future for them. There is now a general consensus of opinion that the future progress of Welsh choral singing depends a great deal on the small choirs and the return to smaller money-prizes.

Penyrgraig Music Lovers.—(a.)—Not secure in pitch at the outset, and the rhythm was heavy. There were good attack and release, but not perfect control of the gradation of tone. The 'bell' effect asked for by the composer was not audible, but there was some tender treatment of the closing phrases.

(b.)—The rhythmic accent was languid, the alto tone a little diffuse and rather too prominent to ensure perfect balance. The 'runs' were a little jaunty, but there was sincerity, and much zeal that sometimes jeopardised the purity of tone.

Tredreghar Sylvia Choral Society.—(a.)—The tone lacked cohesion and resonance. The pace was too urgent, but the rhythm was fairly flexible. The expression was formal. There was not the regretful longing, and the effect of the closing phrase was miscalculated.

(b.)—Vowel formation required attention. The second movement was much too fast to be dignified, and there was a lack of precise part-movement in many bars. The tone did not last well, and the intonation lapsed. There was much strenuous treatment that imperilled the pitch.

Fabian's Bay Choral Society.—(a.)—Very precise and compact, but not intimate in expression at first. The loud chord was defective, but, strangely enough, they suddenly got into the right mood at this point, and sang beautifully right to the closing bar.

(b.)—An excellent start, secure in its utterance and sway of rhythm. The intonation lapsed slightly, but there was a distinct sense of proportion, and the cadences of the sections were all dignified and conclusive. A little unsteadiness was noticed in the florid movement, the tone lost some of its cohesion, and the intonation went wrong. The treatment throughout was musically.

Hereford Harmonic Society.—(a.)—Well-unified, flexible tone, though the soprano tone lacked resonance in the highest notes. The loud chord was deficient, and the tone did not successfully bear expansion. The phrasing was intelligent and well-controlled, and credit is due to them for the 'bell' effect.

(b.)—A little heavy in rhythm at the outset, but the tone was firm and the movement precise. Later the singing was dignified and majestic. There was much sincerity, the execution was clean and neat, and the tone was never forced. The tenors found the high notes a little trying. There was abundant vitality, and the treatment was all in the Handelian manner.

Clydach Choral Society.—(a.)—The attack was languid, and the pace much too slow—it was impossible to 'span a phrase' at the pace. Much of the chording was defective, and the basses were inaccurate. The one good feature was a delicacy at the close.

(b.)—The tone again lacked mellowness, resonance, and freedom, and the singing was unconvincing. The singers roused themselves later, but again lapsed into slackness, and the intonation became troublesome. Their best singing was in the final cadence.

Skewen Music Lovers.—(a.)—The opening displayed unity of tone and attack, but the rhythm was jerky. There was over-eager treatment, coupled with sincerity of utterance. The time-values at the close were inaccurate.

(b.)—A broad, dignified opening, though the 'long stroke' of the accent became monotonous. Later the alto tone was strident, and disturbed both blend and balance. The sopranos caught the infection, and became equally strident. There was more energy than control, and the pitch was forced.

New Tredegar and District.—(a.)—The tone was promising, and there was some rhythmic feeling, but there was not sufficient control of either tone or pace. The time-values at the close were not accurate. There was unanimity in attack and release.

(b.)—Very good intention was evident in the opening phrases, though the tone of the altos was not of the best. The tone of the whole choir deteriorated during the progress of the singing, whilst the intonation unfortunately got seriously wrong. There was more power than purity—with the exception of the basses.

Beaufort Choral Society.—(a.)—An effective start. The altos later did not successfully blend, and the range of the sopranos was limited. There were some inaccuracies, but much of the treatment was gentle and refined, and the final cadence was charmingly sung.

(b.)—The opening was marred by the rather attenuated tone of the altos. Sopranos and basses were very good. The intonation unfortunately got wrong, and seriously handicapped the singers. They recovered themselves in the fugue, though here there was a want of exact rhythmic movement.

Briton Ferry Choral Society.—(a.)—The tone was generous, though not perfectly unified. It was soon evident that here there was a wide range of expression. The basses were not absolutely accurate in the loud chord. There was warmth, sincerity, tenderness, capital control, and the tender sighing effect of the closing bars was impressive. The chording was the best to date.

(b.)—The pace was deliberate, but the tread was stately. The pace of the second movement was right, the part-singing clear, and the phrases were well nourished. The alto lead at letter C was a little reticent. The sopranos distinguished themselves in the clear execution of the florid section. There was a slight tired feeling in the last movement, but the treatment throughout was musically.

Blaina Choral Society.—(a.)—The opening was smooth, if a little heavy and inflexible. The clipping of the ends of phrases was unfortunate. There was warmth of feeling, but the contrasts were too violent. The treatment was more vigorous than tender.

(b.)—Good expansive tone; an emphatic opening which had some breadth; and conspicuously clear utterance arrested the attention. Later there was over-eagerness which was responsible for a rise in pitch, and deterioration of the general tone of the choir. The piano singing was unnecessary and not Handelian, whilst the florid section was marred by a too obvious accentuation of the groups. Generally it was a too sentimental treatment of this broad, dignified theme.

Brynmawr Choral Society.—(a.)—Neat, musical tone. The intonation gave way slightly, and the exaggerated staccato at the ff was unfortunate. There was good control, finished execution plus a little exaggeration.

(b.)—Very good tone, and a well-chosen pace. But it was over-emphatic, and the general effect was too detached—there was no sustaining of the whole phrase. The attack and release were admirably precise. The intonation fluctuated, and caused some uneasiness. The technique was fluent, the tenor leads were bright and buoyant, and the final section was more convincing as expression than any other portion of the chorus.

Treforest United Choir.—(a.)—Subdued, gentle, opening. The utterance was tender and suggestive. The time-values in the final cadence were not accurate, but this singing was all in the perfect part-song manner, and the performance was most convincing and expressive.

(b.)—The pace was a little deliberate, but the singing was dignified and the basses did capital work in the opening movement. The second movement was slow, and the rhythm 'stilted,' whilst later the intonation got wrong. The 'ever faithful' theme was languid, and the slow pace was responsible for the absence of vitality. Later on they revived, and the final page got some spirited treatment. But here, as in many other cases, there was more emphasis than real sostenuto.

Porth Choral Society.—(a.)—The tone was good and the utterance clear. The loud section was, however, a little violent; the pace became too urgent, and some time-values were inaccurate. The closing bars were tenderly treated.

(b.)—Excellent vocal material made an appeal in the opening movement, but there was a want of control later that caused faulty intonation. The expansive phrases revealed the most ample tone in the competition. There was splendid enthusiasm in the utterance, but unfortunately the intonation got worse as they went on.

The judges found no difficulty in awarding the first prize of £40 to Briton Ferry, and the second prize of £10 to Hereford. The marks were:

Friday has for some years been perhaps the most popular day at the Eisteddfod, and this year was no exception. The male-choirs proved a great attraction, and the eighteen choirs that appeared (there was only one absentee) provided the most exciting competition of the week. The test-pieces were (a) 'Fallen heroes' (Cyril Jenkins), and (b) 'Lead, kindly Light' (Protheroe). The time-table did not allow of both pieces being sung, and the judges decided on 'Fallen heroes' as the one test-piece. It is not the composer's best work, though it proved a good test, and was probably interesting to the audience. No doubt the composer will join with us in wishing that a more subtle work were given to these splendid choirs, and we look to him after the good work he has done, to provide music that will test the best powers of the Welsh choirs. Wales has never been better represented, and there has probably never been a better all-round competition. The victory of the Swansea choir was undoubted, and the Middlesbrough Choir (which probably contains many Welshmen) added to their increasing reputation by their clearly being the second-prize winners. Probably in more intricate music they would have done still better, with their great experience.

Plymouth Orphans.—Very good, full tone and capital unity marked the opening phrases. The pace was slow, and the singers tripped at the first difficult bar. The solo was unfortunately quite out of the key, and seriously marred the whole performance. The unaccompanied verse was a little heavy, but the intonation was very good, and the enunciation first-rate. The change of tempo was unnecessary, and unwarrantable in this section, and some of the chording was insecure in page 12. The last movement was broad, but too deliberate and stolid. 80 marks.

Barry District.—Flexible tone, though not resonant. The rallentando was anticipated, but there was much better rhythmic flow. The solo was spirited, though the tone was slightly throaty. The subdued movement was in the right mood, the expression was intimate, but the detaching of the penultimate phrase was a little unfortunate. The agitato section demanded a more urgent accent. The final movement was in the right mood, and the pace was appropriate. In spite of some detached phrasing, there were warmth and assurance. 86 marks.

Aberkenfig.—A neat, rather than a powerful opening, the tenors being of very good quality but inclined to sharpness in the first movement. The attack and release were equally smart and precise, the solo was well sung, and though the pace of the unaccompanied verse was slow, there was some effective light and shade. Later there was a loss of vitality, but the battle music was graphic and stirring. The last movement was too slow, and lacked sustenance, whilst the tenor tone got considerably 'narrowed.' But there was capital phrasing. 82 marks.

Ebenezer Mission.—The tone was excellent—mellow and resonant in all departments,—and the opening displayed remarkable rhythmic grip. The combined unison was not immaculate in its intonation. The solo was very well sung, and the unaccompanied verse was beautifully expressed. The outburst 'For the love of liberty' was magnificent and thrilling, whilst the battle music was sufficiently vivid and clear. The final movement was slow, and the tone got a little strained in the last page. But on the whole it was a fine performance. 94 marks.

Cleveland Harmonic.—The tone here was not as big as that of the previous choir, but it was remarkably clear and resonant. The enunciation was first-rate in the opening movement, though the phrasing was a little snatchy. They achieved a wonderful pianissimo, and were admirably served by the excellent soloist. The subdued section was fluent and finished, though a little effusive in expression. The next movement was precise and well marked, and the battle music was wonderfully coloured as tone. There was just the right 'clang' to make it realistic. The last movement began slowly and increased in pace later. A striking climax was achieved. Another fine performance, slightly less impressive than that of the previous choir. 92 marks.

Neath and District.—There was fine grip at the outset, but the tone was 'pressed' out of tune, and the pace fluctuated. The pianissimo was not forthcoming; the solo was good, but not striking. The subdued verse was slow, and some exaggerated emphasis made a curious effect in the finale phrase 'We die.' There was fine unanimity in the utterance of the succeeding movement, but the invocation was exaggerated, and the battle music was too fast to be clearly defined. The last movement was forced in pitch and too explosive in utterance. 78 marks.

Barry.—Refined, pleasant tone, but a little loose in attack and indefinite in utterance. It was careful singing, but not the appropriate style. The solo was well sung, and the subdued chorus was very good, though the pp and ppp were neglected. The succeeding movement was not martial enough, and the battle music was nicely sung, but without the percussion and 'clang' of other choirs. The last movement was pure enough as tone, but not convincing as expression. 84 marks.

Abercarn.—The pace was slow and the contrast too violent. The pp was missed, and the solo got sharp. The subdued section was fluent, if a little extravagant in expression. The battle music was formal and matter-of-fact, the enunciation not uniformly good, and some of the chording was deficient. The pace was right in the last movement, but more breadth was required. 75 marks.

Duffryn Elyrch.—The opening phrase was well gripped, but the tone became a little loose, and the enunciation a little indefinite. They were fortunate in their very good tenor soloist. The unaccompanied section was fluent in rhythm, and tender in expression. The martial movement was too deliberate, though very earnest. The tenor tone was not resourceful enough. The pace of the last movement was well chosen, but the chording was sometimes defective. The singing was always earnest, if not eager enough. 82 marks.

London Welsh.—A well-equipped choir possessing highly dramatic temperament, but unfortunately beauty of tone and purity of intonation were sacrificed. There was much exaggeration, the tenors forced the tone to the point of shouting, and there was a conflict between the pianoforte and choir concerning the pitch. The battle music was rapid and pictorial, but not musical. It was most unfortunate that technique of such a high order did not produce better results. The eagerness was tremendous, and the vitality astonishing, but these do not count for much if the beauty of tone is almost entirely sacrificed. 79 marks.

Bargoed Teify.—The intonation was insecure at the outset, and there were technical blemishes. The tenors were good, and the utterance clear. There was some colour and mood, and the tenor soloist was first-rate. The subdued section was slow, but very earnest. The next movement displayed a good sense of rhythm, and the battle music was fast, but well controlled. There was some faulty chording. The pace of the last movement was slow, the intonation went wrong, and the tone was strained. 80 marks.

Bargoed.—The opening was firm, displaying excellent tone and neat phrasing. The Rall. and pp were exaggerated, and the subdued section suffered from exaggeration and a want of proportion. The soloist was fairly good. The next movement was exhilarating, and the battle music rational and well-defined, in spite of some faulty chording. The final movement was well sustained at an appropriate pace, and the intonation was good. 88 marks.

Pentyuarn and Dowlais.—Very good, well-controlled tone—the tenors not equal to the basses in quality. The pp was neglected. The solo was well declaimed. In the subdued section the tenors did not quite reach the high notes, and there were faulty chords. 'For the love of liberty' was excellently declaimed, and the battle music was clear if not sufficiently vivid. The first tenors were again occasionally below the note. The final movement was sung at a good pace, but the chording was not immaculate. Throughout there were good discipline and control, but the general effect was a little mechanical. 88 marks.

Williamstown.—An excellent start—free from exaggeration. The pp was excellent, the tenor soloist was splendid, and the unaccompanied verse was beautifully sung. This high standard was lowered in the battle music, which was faulty in its chording, and undecided in its rhythm. The final movement was well sung, though the tone lacked 'body.' 89 marks.

Gorphuysfa-Skeuen.—Neatness, precision, and a good lilt marked the opening, though the tone was not resonant. The subdued portion was slow, and not free from exaggeration. They 'toyed' with the dialogue section, and the battle music made a chattering effect. The last movement was too slow, the tone became narrow, and there was no resource for the climax. 76 marks.

Pontyol.—A big, fine tone, which was often uncontrolled. The intonation was seriously at fault, the pronunciation was casual, and the rallentandos were much exaggerated. The solo was good, but the subdued verse suffered from inaccuracy, slow pace, and a loud style. There was some excitement in the battle music, but the chording was at fault here and in the final movement, which ended with force plus bad intonation. 70 marks.

Pontardawe.—Compact, well-controlled opening—the utterance being conspicuously clear. The tenor unison was not successful. The soloist was very effective, and the unaccompanied verse, though too emphatic, was earnest and strongly felt by the singers. The striking unison made a good effect, but there was some unnecessary 'pulling-up' of the time. The battle music had 'clang,' though the accent was somewhat loose. Unfortunately the pitch was forced up a semitone in the last movement. Here again there was remarkable unity in the utterance. 87 marks.

Garw.—The tone was a little strident and uncontrolled. There was much energy in the opening movement. The soloist possessed an admirable voice, but the unaccompanied verse was too loud and effusive. The battle music was articulate, though the second tenors were a little sharp. The last movement was dignified, though a trifle too deliberate. 84 marks.

In the Church and Chapel Choir Competition there were only four choirs, first place being taken by Fabian's Bay. The Builth Wells Glee Singers were the best of three small choirs (16 to 20 voices) in the Madrigal Class, whilst the Abercwmboi Choir secured the prize in the Boys' Choir Class, in which there were five entries. The entries in all the solo classes were very numerous, and there was as usual an abundance of excellent vocal material. It is a very gratifying fact that the prizes were won in nearly every case by intelligence and superior interpretation. This was especially the case in the Soprano and Baritone Classes, and it was a joy to listen to such splendid interpretations by these youthful vocalists. The intelligent and intimate way in which many of the competitors sang Schubert, Brahms, and Elgar during the week is of the greatest significance. The winners were:—Soprano, Miss Ethel Bull, Brynmawr; mezzo-soprano, Miss Cissie Thomas, Newport; contralto, Miss L. M. Williams, Swansea; tenor, Mr. D. Thomas, Pontycymmer; baritone, Mr. W. James Davies, Rhymney;

Mr. B. Nicholas, Maescywmmer; whilst the prizes in the Welsh solo competitions were awarded to Miss L. Kinsey, Miss Bronwen Williams, Mr. W. M. Griffiths, and Mr. Griff. Hill. The other awards were:—Duet (T. & B.), Messrs. Watkin Hughes and Halkyn Roberts; duet (S. & A.), Misses E. Hall and B. Thomas divided with Misses Wheat and Smith; string orchestra (one entry), Mr. Angle's Orchestra; string quartet, Mr. John Glyn's Party; pianoforte trio, Miss Lilian Morgan, Miss Evelyn Bone, and Mr. Gwilym Thomas; violin (senior and junior), Paul Beard, of Birmingham; cello, Mr. W. Thomas and Mr. D. Williams (equal); flute, Ernest Tobias; clarinet, J. Edwards; triple harp, Miss A. C. Lloyd, Miss Enid Walters, and Miss Laura Jones; pedal harp, Mr. Roger Thomas; pianoforte (senior), Misses Winifred Davey and Sarah Woodward; pianoforte (junior), Miss Teague.

The programme was much overloaded, the time-table completely broke down, preliminary competitions overlapped each other, and the Eisteddfod meetings were so prolonged that the concerts began an hour late. It is strange that committees refuse to learn from past experience, and it is becoming increasingly urgent that the National Eisteddfod Association should take the matter in hand, and appoint a permanent central committee of able men, who will take charge of the syllabus and the time-table in the interests of progress in music in Wales, and order at the Eisteddfod.

The same lack of discrimination that was responsible for the poor selection of test-pieces was evident in the concert arrangements. 'Elijah' and 'Messiah' offer not the slightest inducement to Eisteddfodwyr, as the promoters must know to their cost after the deplorable attendance, which was probably the worst on record. Credit must be given to the conductor, Mr. W. R. Carr, and his choir for very good work in both performances, in spite of some very original tempi.

A special concert was held on the Monday evening, at which works by Welsh composers only were given (with the exception of Mendelssohn's 'Fingal's Cave' Overture). There was an increased orchestra (led by Mr. Angle), and Lord Howard de Walden contributed handsomely towards the expenses incurred. It will be news to many to learn that the 'Welsh' composers included J. E. German (usually known as Edward German), Josef Holbrooke, and Vaughan Williams. Considerable enthusiasm was aroused by Miss Stage's playing of Holbrooke's Concerto, 'The song of Gwyn ap Nudd,' and German's Welsh Rhapsody, whilst Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody gave great pleasure. The remaining concerts were of a miscellaneous character, the most interesting feature being the production of two new works by Mr. Cyril Jenkins (who again won all the composition prizes offered by the Eisteddfod Committee). The first was an ambitious symphonic-poem for full orchestra, 'The awakening of Wales,' and the second a 'Fantasia on Welsh airs' for string orchestra. His orchestral writing shows a great advance on his work of two years ago, and if as yet there is not the individual touch that marks his vocal writing, there are not wanting signs of great promise. He was probably fettered by the Welsh tunes, especially in the tone-poem, which lacks fluent and direct utterance, and it was not good judgment to set Welsh tunes that have been so admirably treated by another composer. Mr. Jenkins is arousing the greatest hopes amongst his musical friends, and we look forward with interest to an original orchestral work, which will give him the opportunity for individual utterance.

The principal vocalists were:—Miss Dilys Jones, Madame Edith Evans, Miss Edith Gunter, Madame Laura Evans Williams, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Miss Amy Evans, Miss Ella Caspers, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. David Brazell, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. Dan Richards, Mr. David Ellis, Mr. Ivor Foster, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Gwynne Davies, Mr. David Hughes, and Mr. D. Bodyscombe; solo pianists, Miss Stage and Miss Auriol Jones; solo violin, Miss B. Ferguson; solo harpist, Mr. Tom Bryant; conductor, Eisteddfod choir, Mr. W. R. Carr; leader of the orchestra, Mr. A. Angle.

The adjudicators were Dr. H. Walford Davies, Mr. Harry Evans, Dr. H. Vaughan Thomas, Dr. Roland Rogers, Mr. David Jenkins, and Mr. Dan Price. The accompanists were Mr. J. E. Deacon, Mr. A. E. Sims, Mr. Luther Owen, Mr. Llewellyn Bevan, and Mr. R. Howells.

Dr. H. Walford Davies writes to us as follows :

The outstanding features of the National Eisteddfod at Abergavenny were the superb phrasing and beautiful tone of the winning choir in Bach's Motet, and the high level of excellence attained in the solo-voice contests, even by the numberless losers. Four choirs responded to the committee's spirited offer of a challenge cup for a supreme choral-test class. All four had sung previously in the 'chief choral,' as it is called, so that an audience of some thousands of genuine amateur adjudicators were able in the same afternoon to hear the same choirs in Mendelssohn's 'Rise up, arise' (and the simple chorale, 'To Thee, O Lord'), and in an extremely difficult unaccompanied eight-part Motet. The choice of difficult test-pieces—if they be really fine as music and not barrenly difficult—was utterly vindicated, seeing that in every case the singing of the Bach was far finer than that of the easier Mendelssohn choruses. Few, as they listened, could have failed to realise this. One of the judges as he walked away was heard to remark, 'This will kill Mendelssohn'; and certainly, though Mendelssohn is quite safe and will live on and be loved, the Abergavenny meeting will strengthen the hands of those who desire to press on to music 'brave and new.'

There is something quite unique in a preliminary solo contest at the National. Many of us had to begin these tests at 8 a.m., and it is inspiring for everyone concerned to hear perhaps forty-five or fifty good solo singers for about three minutes each in instant succession. General characteristics of Welsh musicianship are revealed, singers hear their own faults and other people's virtues to advantage, and a general sense of eager interest culminates if all are asked at the end to roll out some fine peroration in unison. The strand of tone produced is quite glorious and memorable, and the whole proceeding is stimulating and helpful, and many an amazing lesson might be learned here by many a famous but mannered concert-singer from unspoiled country artists.

Record entries did not by any means bring record audiences to Abergavenny. The front seats were badly deserted. This is significant. Music-lovers will not gladly sit through 18 male-voice choir performances of the same piece when one contest takes three-and-a-half hours or so. It is a discipline rather than a luxury. It would seem to suggest that some reconstruction of the Eisteddfod programme is due. And it also seems a thousand pities to have such a gathering of singers present and not to organize some combined singing such as would fitly culminate each meeting and would give both singers and audiences a joy worth all their journey, trouble, and expense.

We regret to hear that the Eisteddfod has resulted in a loss, which will have to be met by the guarantors.

BRISBANE, QUEENSLAND.

The annual Queensland Eisteddfod of 1913 was held at Brisbane at Easter. Some thirteen years had elapsed since the Festival was last held in the Capital City, but nevertheless it proved a distinct success. The prize-money allotted to the music section amounted to £530, and several valuable trophies were also donated for the choral events. An innovation in the programme was a 'Madrigal' competition for the chief choirs, two Oriana numbers being selected. Despite unfavourable weather on the Saturday, the attendance of the public was uniformly good, and on Monday evening, when the grand choral contest was decided, the audience numbered fully 10,000. A temporary structure was erected on the Cricket Ground to accommodate the large crowds. A feature of the Eisteddfod was the performances of the Blackstone-Ipswich Cambrian Choir, conducted by Mr. Leonard Francis, who won the Grand Choral Championship, the Grand Madrigal Competition, and the Ladies' Choir item. This choir had twice won the championship of the Commonwealth, and will be remembered by members of the Sheffield Choir. Mr. Francis also conducted the winners of the Business Firms' Chords. Three adjudicators officiated, Prof. Ives, Mr. W. Arundel Orchard, and Mr. F. F. Harmer. Three choirs from the sister State of New South Wales competed and won several events. The Toowoomba Philharmonic Society secured three second places. At the conclusion of the competitions the massed choirs performed the 'Hallelujah Chorus,' with splendid effect. His Excellency The State Governor, Sir William MacGregor, Lady and Miss MacGregor and suite were present both on Saturday and Monday, and were very appreciative of the high standard attained at the Eisteddfod.

The following are details of the chief choral classes :

MALE-VOICE SECTION.

(Three choirs competed for the prize of £50.)

Test: 'The Hebrew captives' (Leon Paliard).

1st. Bargoed Teifi (Mr. D. Jenkins).

The adjudicators were Mr. Arthur Fagge, Mr. John Williams, Mr. D. Edgar Thomas, and the Rev. David Lewis.

CANNOCK.

This competition took place on August 18 in connection with the annual Floral Fête, before an audience of many thousands.

The results were as follows:

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'What care I how fair she be' (J. Blumenthal).
'Song of freedom' (R. Schumann).

1st. Wednesbury and District Gleemen (Mr. E. Amphlett).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: 'Beauteous morn' (German).

1st. Wednesbury and District Ladies' Choir (Mr. E. Amphlett).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'The sea hath its pearls' (C. Finsuti).

'Viking song' (S. Coleridge-Taylor).

1st. Watling Street and District Choral Society (Mr. W. Sherwin).

2nd. Wednesbury and District Choral Association (Mr. E. Amphlett).

Dr. W. G. McNaught was the adjudicator.

Mr. A. S. Manfield (Hillsdale, Skelmorlie) writes: 'In the interesting account on Professor Terry in the June Musical Times you say "he established the first music competitive Festival in Scotland in 1909." May I be permitted to point out that a competitive musical Festival was held in Paisley on March 26-28, 1907, and this, I believe, was the first held in Scotland.' [Mr. Manfield is right—the event was reported in the Musical Times for May, 1907 (p. 325). We well remember the occasion, and we are sorry that the scheme was abandoned.—ED., Record.]

The sixth annual Eisteddfod at Towyn drew three choirs in the chief choral class, the test in which was 'The heavens are telling' (Haydn). The Towyn Choral Society came out first, and the Towyn Male-Voice Choir also won in their class.

Pontypridd at its second annual gathering drew eight male-voice choirs in the club competition, the prize being won by Blaenclydach Liberal Club (Mr. W. J. Michael). The test was 'Valiant warriors.' The open male-voice choir class drew five choirs, Maritime winning the prize of £20. The test was 'The charge of the Light Brigade' (D. C. Williams). Dr. Caradog Roberts adjudicated at both the above events.

IN ORDER TO BECOME ABLE TO PLAY AT SIGHT

readily, you must be able to dispense with the "spelling-out" of the notes and to disregard their notational values. The mere sight of the printed symbols should automatically suggest the correct keys to be played. There should be no conscious mental exertion in locating the keys—the mind should be free to consider questions of time, rhythm, and expression.

A few pianists obtain this sight-playing ability without much difficulty—the majority obtain it after years of drudgery for many hours daily.

The Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing substitutes three months' practising for less than half-an-hour daily for all this drudgery, and guarantees a much greater proficiency after that time.

Since without the ability to play at sight no real enjoyment can be derived from pianoforte playing, pianists of all degrees of proficiency should send for my free booklet, which fully describes the simple methods used.

TOBIAS AUGUSTUS MATTHAY.

The mental, physical, and physiological problems associated with pianoforte playing consist in the endeavour to co-ordinate a complex nervous and muscular apparatus beginning at the brain and ending at the tips of the fingers.

In part it is a struggle of the unfit to adapt itself to unfavourable conditions, for however it may be claimed that the existing keyboard is on the whole convenient for all the purposes it is designed to serve, it will always remain that the natural inequality of the length and strength of fingers and thumbs must be battled with by every individual who desires to play a pianoforte. Heredity counts for nothing in this field; no one is to the manner born.

In his remarkable essay, 'Thoughts upon the musical sense in animals and man,'* which has not had from musicians the attention it deserves, August Weismann, the great apostle of the doctrine of the non-transmission of acquired characters, thus states his general conclusions:

The musical sense is evidently innate in the human brain, and is independent of all training and practice undergone by ancestors. The predisposition may be strong or feeble, but even the greatest talent does not enable the possessor to climb to the height reached by the music of his time without being raised by instruction. That so great a height can be reached in a life-time by the son of a German peasant, or even by the offspring of a savage race, evidently proves that the musical sense of to-day has been inherent in man since times immemorial, and that it has not been increased by the development of music or by practice. It has nevertheless been brought to a higher stage of development in the most civilised races, as we shall see further on.

And he goes on to discuss the application of his doctrine to the development of the hand in pianoforte playing. He says:

It is as impossible to explain the development of music by an increase and perfecting of the musical talent, as to explain the superiority of our pianists over those of Mozart's time by a recent improvement in the dexterity of the human hand. The very hands which, in Bach's day, could only give a bald and imperfect performance on the spinet, would now, upon a Steinway's or Bechstein's grand pianoforte, produce all the enchanting effect of an orchestra. The causes of this immense change are manifold. First a gradual improvement in the instrument,—itself a result of tradition which permitted an advance upon the acquisitions of earlier generations; secondly, parallel with this advance, the development of appropriate music; lastly, the immense improvement in pianoforte technique which we associate with the names of Haydn, Mozart, Clementi, Hummel, Moscheles, Thalberg, and Liszt.† No one would dream of suggesting that this advance in 'technique' is due to an improvement, as regards pianoforte-playing, in the powers of the human hand, produced by the practice of several consecutive generations. Such an origin is indeed impossible, because, happily, every one does not play the pianoforte, because every pianist is not a performer of eminence, and because the children of such performers rarely become performers themselves. . . .

No one can believe that the human hand was created for playing on the pianoforte,—that it became what it now is in order that man might be able to make use of this instrument. It is, as we know, fitted for grasping and for the power of delicate touch; and as these are very useful qualities, of high importance in the struggle for life, we feel no difficulty in explaining the gradual perfecting, by processes of selection, of that form of hand which the higher animals had already gained. By means of selection, the hand became the perfectly articulated, sensitive, and mobile structure that we find, not only in ourselves, but in the very lowest savages. But we can do many things with our fingers which were never intended, if I may use the expression; we can, for instance, play on the pianoforte, now that this instrument has been invented. And furthermore a native African could, if trained as a child and under certain conditions, learn all the technique of the modern pianoforte as thoroughly as a European.

We inherit tendencies and faculties, but acquisitions are assimilated through environment and education. Liszt, who was singularly well equipped by nature (although he did not derive his capacity by direct inheritance), played well because others before him had also played well. Every generation has to accumulate the experience of the past, and may, be add something to the common stock. Empiricism, however successful and instinctively enlightened, has to submit to analysis and justification, blind alleys and true roads have to be mapped out, so that whosoever will may know where and where not to journey. It is in this useful field of investigation that the subject of this sketch has earned peculiar distinction. By his patient and skilful analysis of all that pertains to pianoforte playing he has dispelled many unfructifying illusions, and placed the study of pianoforte technique in the category of the exact sciences. This, however, is not to say that his end is a mechanical one. The goal is the music and its adequate interpretation. The technique striven for is the language of expression, the vocabulary of which he has done so much to enlarge.

Tobias Augustus Matthay was born in London on February 19, 1858. Both his parents were natives of the North German province, Das Bergische, near Düsseldorf. Herr Matthay, the father, was a teacher of languages. He settled in England before his marriage, and became a naturalised British subject. Mr. Matthay believes that he inherited his artistic impulses from his mother, who, although not specially musical, had feeling and taste. His father's qualities were of a practical kind, and no doubt his precept and example had much to do with the formation of Mr. Matthay's character. In his youth, Matthay was drawn to both science and music: a dual interest which he has maintained throughout life, and which has enabled him to bring the methods of science to bear upon the analysis of the technical and musical problems of pianoforte playing. An occupation of his juvenile days was the manufacture of fireworks. It is gratifying to record that this pyrotechnical fancy was never afterwards applied to pianoforte playing, for nothing could be farther than show or display from his ideals, style, and achievements. He began to play the pianoforte when he was about six years of age, and after private lessons extending over a few years he entered the

* 'Essays on Heredity and kindred biological problems.' By Dr. August Weismann, vol. ii. Authorised translation, published by the Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1892.

† It is curious that Weismann omits mention of Chopin.

Royal Academy of Music in 1871, and very rapidly distinguished himself in that institution which has done so much for British musicians, by winning in 1872 what was practically the only valuable prize available at that period—the Sterndale Bennett scholarship. He studied the pianoforte in turn under Dorrell and Walter Macfarren, and composition under Sterndale Bennett, until the death of this distinguished musician in 1875, and afterwards under Sullivan and Prout. He obtained a £25 prize for the composition of a Pianoforte quartet, given by the late J. F. H. Read. In 1876 he was made a sub-professor of the pianoforte, and in 1878 a sub-professor of harmony at the Academy.

At this period he devoted most of his time to composition, but when, in 1880, he became a full professor of the pianoforte at the Academy, he gave his first pianoforte recital, and began to practise seriously with a view to a concert career. During the next fifteen years he gave numerous recitals and performances in London and the provinces. But although in this way he gained repute, he states emphatically that by far the most enlightening and suggestive experience of his early life was hearing Anton Rubinstein play in London. Here, to Matthay, was a revelation of unthought of possibilities: a marvellous technique and depth of interpretative feeling that set him pondering over ways and means. Teaching now became a passion that absorbed his thoughts and gradually drew him from performance and composition, and he began to investigate the underlying psychology and physiology of pianoforte playing, and the potentialities of the instrument, and after years of close observation he brought out in 1903 the most extraordinary volume ever published upon the technique of pianoforte playing, entitled 'The Act of Touch.*' This amazingly meticulous analysis was received by some critics with incredulity (we are glad to say not by the Musical Times), but the book made its way, and was soon followed by 'The First Principles of pianoforte playing' (for school use),† and 'Relaxation studies'‡ and other similar works that apply the author's ingenious analytical and synthetical principles.

A SUMMARY OF THE MATTHAY TEACHINGS.

The Matthay teachings are not at all a method of playing. On the contrary, they are explanations and elucidations of ascertained laws which must be obeyed in order to produce all the possible effects and means of playing, both good and bad, whatever the school and whoever the artist, whether past, present, or future. Obedience to these laws enables anyone who will take the trouble to master them to express himself through the pianoforte. A main feature is that music and technique are never allowed to become dissociated. It is insisted that a pianoforte key must never be touched without a definite musical—tonal and rhythmic—purpose in view. The pupil is trained to think and judge for himself, and is led to learn how to produce the effects which he gradually realises are musical necessities.

This implies that the factors of the music studied are made clear and that there is full understanding of its form and feeling, and especially of its underlying message. 'The first step,' says Mr. Matthay 'is to realise that music is not a series of brick-like disconnected fragments consisting of "subjects" and accented and unaccented "bits," but that all music implies movement and progression, and that it is in this sense of orderly growth, in a word, rhythm, which compels us to feel that the executant is really telling us his thoughts and not merely making unmeaning sounds.' This phase of Mr. Matthay's teaching has been adopted lately by a number of advanced theorists, because it at once makes the objective of music-teaching vivid and clear. The idea applies throughout—to the piece as a whole, to each of its phrases, to the playing of each group of running notes as a progression towards the next pulse or beat, and to the act of tone-production as a movement of the key starting from its surface level and aimed and directed to the place in key-descent where the sound begins. If every note sounded is to be part of a piece of music, and not to be mere unmusical chattering, there must be an act of timing—that is, a movement of the key directed from its position of rest at its surface-level towards a timed place in its descent where sound begins. In the technical teaching the mechanism of the instrument itself is first made clear. It is shown that all tone and tone-variety depend purely upon the actual speed of the key during its short-lived downward movement, and that once the key is down, nothing can be added to the tone. This leads logically to the conclusion that all force required to produce these varying movements of the key can only be correctly gauged by insisting that it is adjusted solely and always in automatic and actual response to the sensation of resistance experienced, a resistance which varies precisely with each variety of sound we try to get from the key, and which we can easily feel if we but attend to every note we play. This attitude of attention to music in performance through the muscular sense of key-resistance is one of the most important and far-reaching of Mr. Matthay's teachings. Without this attention given precisely in this way, no one ever has played or ever will play really musically. This fact leads naturally to the consideration of the muscular means required to produce all the various forces required. Here it is shown that the mistake always has been to try to analyse touch from the mere movements which happen to accompany its production, a proceeding which is just as hopeless a way of arriving at the truth as would be an attempt to learn the action of the cylinders and boiler of a locomotive by watching its driving wheels revolve. The true action of the three levers used in playing is therefore analysed, and their required exertions and passivities are made plain; all possible forms of touch being shown to be built up from the three main elements—finger exertion, hand exertion, and arm weight, in combination with the rotary exertions of the forearm. Thus we may play a passage showing only finger movement, whereas each act of key-depression depends upon a combination of exertions of the finger, the hand, and the forearm rotatively, and with a momentarily-released arm to serve at times as a basis for the operation; the rotary activities (not necessarily showing any movements) being perhaps the most far-reaching element of all towards making or marring success. Thus the production of all kinds of tone-differences is made clear, the contrasts of duration, and also the laws of agility which must be obeyed for the acquisition of that mere 'brilliancy,' which the public so often mistakes for music. Endless pounding of finger-exercises becomes unnecessary, since only a sufficient number are required as a vehicle for the acquisition of the muscular and rhythmical habits which the student has to acquire, and as a means of attaining endurance. The formation of correct habits can at once be begun even by the youngest child; all tentative and futile experimenting in the dark, with its years of wasted life and energy, is done away with, and we find children of tender years exhibiting a mastery of technique and expression which was attained only by master-players of a quarter of a century ago.

It may help to make this explanation of a difficult matter clearer to supplement it by a few extracts from 'The Act of Touch.'

The empiric method of pianoforte education consisted in choosing pieces, studies, and technical exercises, more or less suitable for the learner, and then leaving him to make tentative efforts to perform these; the comparative failure that resulted from his helpless, undirected flounderings being corrected—as it was supposed—by scolding, bullying, or encouraging him into trying again, according to the temper of the instructor!

A rational scheme of education, on the contrary, would consist: in analysing the subject to be taught; analysing also the successful doings of successful artists; thence deducing the laws and rules that govern successful performance; and then directly communicating such laws of procedure to the pupil, instead of leaving him to discover them for himself.

If correct habits are not at once formed, at least thrice the time will have to be spent. There is the time wasted in fixing the wrong habit; then the time required to weaken that wrong habit to the point of effacement; then, at last, the time needed to form the correct mental-muscular connections.

How requisite, therefore, that these laws—the elements of pianoforte playing, should be thoroughly understood!

Realising that our object must be to create key-movement, we shall then neither attempt to hit or strike the key—as if it were a ball or nail, nor shall we attempt to jam it down upon its 'bed'—as if it were a nutcracker! We shall, on the contrary, project our minds as it were to the hammer-end of the key; and our purpose will be to move the string by means of that hammer-end. In a word, we shall not try to play the key-board—or at it; but shall instead try to play the strings by means of the key.

Now we never dream of hitting or striking the tennis racket, the violin bow, or the billiard cue; instead, we take them up, take hold of them, and use them. And that is precisely how we should treat the pianoforte key. When we wish to play a note, we must first equip or 'arm' our finger-end with the implement we wish to employ—and that is the key. We must take hold of that key by placing a finger-tip against its surface, and thus enable ourselves to realise its weight and resistance through the muscular sense. Thus realising the weight of the tool we mean to employ, we must then proceed positively to aim with its opposite end—the hammer end.

It is no use 'aiming at' the key, we must aim with it; for the key is not to be regarded as a ball, but rather in the light of a racket, cue, or other speed-tool. With the finger thus equipped, the key will be felt to be but a mechanically-provided continuation of the finger itself,—an intimate connection and elongation of our body, ending only with the hammer-tip; and we shall feel that it is with that end of this tool (thus under our immediate control) that we have to aim, and create speed in the string.

This aiming or directing of the key comprises three points:

(a) We must aim the key, so that its full speed is reached at the moment that the hammer-end is in communication with the string—the moment that the escapement permits the hammer to rebound with the string—the moment that we can hear the beginning of the sound, if we listen for it.

(b) We must cease to apply energy against the key at that same moment; excepting that slight residuum of weight that is required in Tenuto and Legato, to prevent the key from rebounding.

(c) We must determine in which manner the required speed shall be reached, for if the total energy is applied suddenly, then the result is a 'brilliant' but 'short' tone; whereas, if it is instead applied gradually, then we shall obtain a true 'singing,' or sympathetic tone, of good carrying power. . . . and thus obtain far finer control over the tone.

These are large claims, but no one fully acquainted with the results of Mr. Matthay's teaching as exemplified by his pupils will say that they are exaggerated. York Bowen, Irene Scharrer, Myra Hess, Gertrude Peppercorn, who have a Continental reputation, are all products of his school, and there are hundreds of artists—teachers here and abroad—who owe their success to his guidance. Ten of his pupils are now on the Royal Academy staff as professors, and seventeen senior teachers are on the staff of his own Pianoforte School in Wimpole Street, London.

In 1893 Mr. Matthay married Jessie Kennedy, daughter of the famous Scottish singer, David Kennedy. Mrs. Matthay has since become well known as a dramatic reciter.

Mr. Matthay has composed a mass of pianoforte music, orchestral works, and songs. Of these there are published many Pianoforte solos, a Duet for pianoforte and violin, a Quartet for strings and pianoforte, and a Concerto in A minor. But he is more widely known by his books, which include besides those named above 'Commentaries on the teaching of pianoforte technique,' 'The rotation principle: its application and mastery,' 'The child's first steps in piano playing,' and 'Double-third scales: their fingering and practice.'

A new work, 'Musical interpretation: its laws and principles, and their application to teaching and performing,' is in the press, and will be issued shortly. Mr. Matthay considers this to be his most important work.

PROGRAMME MUSIC, FOLK-TUNE, AND PROGRESS.

(See JULY No., p. 439.)

By M.-D. CALVOGROSSI.

Our study of programme music has led us to the conclusion that through the influence of poetic or picturesque suggestion musical art has acquired a wealth of valuable material and resources which, as Wagner has pointed out, that stimulus alone could help to bring up. And certainly no one should overlook the fact that the evolution occurred at the very moment when the classical methods, after having reached their climax, were gradually sinking into the rut of empty, conventional formalism.

No musical style, no style in any art can live for ever: not only because the temperamental conditions of artists and public change, but also because there is a limit to the possibilities of any style, and in any case a time would come when all that can be said through the medium of a given style would be said, and artists persisting to adhere to its tenets doomed to 'go laboriously through all the motions of the reaper and binder in an empty field.' (G. B. Shaw, 'Three plays for Puritans,' Preface.) Pessimistic though the view may seem, one is almost tempted to believe, furthermore, that musical art cannot everlastingly feed on its own substance; and that almost as soon as it has succeeded in reaching the state of utmost independence, of pure abstract ideality—has, in Dr. Riemann's words, 'succeeded in shaking off the bonds that united it to poetry and to dance'—it tends to become increasingly academical and stereotyped through sheer exhaustion of its stock of resources. And then no amount of technical ingenuity can make up for the deficiencies.

From what we are able to notice at the present moment, we may suppose that after each period of 'fertilization,' such as that by poetry, music again tends towards a state of 'absolute' independence, which shall endure until the necessity of a new enrichment is felt. In effect, the tendency towards actual programme music, nowadays, is waning fast. The ordinary type of tone-poem, as exemplified in Liszt's and Dr. Richard Strauss's, appears almost as conventional as that of the classical symphony; and among the musicians whom one cannot help acknowledging—whether one likes their music or not—as the most advanced of to-day, very few write materially descriptive or narrative music except quite occasionally. For example, although in the works of the French 'impressionist' composers we notice the undeniable influence of poetic suggestion, their music, even if one insists upon its not being absolutely 'pure' music, is far nearer to pure music than to positive description or narration—M. Debussy's 'La Mer' is almost the sole egregious exception one can adduce. So that in the output of that school, we see how music has once again begun to 'shake off the bonds uniting to poetry,' and is proceeding towards a 'pure, abstract' state. Except for M. Schönberg's tone-poem, 'Pelléas und Mélisande,' the contemporary Viennese school has hardly produced any programme music, nor any instrumental music connected with a poetic subject—it inclines, indeed, most unconditionally towards the abstract. As for the younger Hungarians, they have not yet evinced, and there is no reason to think they will evince, the slightest inclination to seek inspiration in poetic themes.

Putting together these facts, and a few others of no lesser moment (for instance, in his score 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' M. Igor Stravinsky, by far the most modern in spirit of Russian composers, shows himself thoroughly independent of direct pantomimic suggestions or intentions), one may assume that a new period of pure music—music founded on the elements derived from the fertilization by poetry—is opening.

However, poetry is not the only element of fertilization to which musicians have resorted during the 19th century and after. Another, as momentous and beneficial, and whose employment has given rise to no less discussion, is folk-song.

To trace the practice of using folk-songs back to its origin would teach us little. Indeed, from the Middle Ages to the present day, a great number of composers of all schools have made use, eventually, of folk-tunes. But in the course of the 19th century has appeared the idea of nationality in music; and thenceforward 'folk-tune' has become, not without ground, the password and catchword of all controversialists, a current theory being that nationality in music consists in or depends upon the use of national tunes.

Leaving the student to decide for himself, according to his own feeling, whether such a thing as nationality exists in music—a question, in my opinion, of no greater practical usefulness, so far as the actual appreciation of music is concerned, than the several pertaining to the relationship between musical works and their programmes—I wish to point out that if it exists, it depends on many conditions besides the use of folk-tunes.

It is an acknowledged fact, of course, that a tune becomes a folk-tune, spreads through a country, and is preserved by tradition only forasmuch as it appeals to the people; and that with the course of time it undergoes characteristic alterations whose result is to increase its fitness (as in the well-known case of French soldier-songs adopted by the Arabs, and thenceforth enriched with Oriental vocalisms). Therefore, if one believes in nationality, it is quite natural to believe that composers will find in the folk-tunes of their country a wealth of eminently suitable material. But they afford, after all, only raw material, and all depends upon the spirit in which they are used. Beethoven's 'Rassoumovsky' Quartets, despite the Russian themes to be found in them, are Beethoven throughout; nor does the first section of his 'Pastoral' Symphony, whose theme is as similar as possible to many Russian folk-tunes, afford any particular ground for a comparison with music of the Russian school.

A categorical case in point offers in the fact that we have characteristic music on Spanish themes written by composers of different countries: among others, Hugo Wolf's 'Spanisches Liederbuch,' Glinka's 'Summer night in Madrid' and 'La Jota Aragonesa,' Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Spanish Capriccio.' Also works by Borodin and by Balakirev, Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' Chabrier's 'España,' Dr. Saint-Saëns's 'Jota Aragonesa' and 'Caprice Andalou,' M. Debussy's 'La soirée dans Grenade' and 'Iberia,' M. Ravel's 'Rapsodie Espagnole,' &c. And all these works differ in spirit and in style (imagine anyone trying to find traits common to M. Debussy's 'Iberia' and to Dr. Saint-Saëns's 'Caprice' or 'Jota!'); they display the very same idiosyncrasies as any other characteristic works by the same composers, and they do not resemble in the least music on Spanish themes written by Spanish composers like M. Felipe Pedrell, Albeniz, M. Manuel de Falla, or M. Turina.

The practical advantage resulting from the use of folk-tune, then, does not consist—at least essentially—in its helping composers to assert national idiosyncrasies. What should interest us is the fact that the elements borrowed from or suggested by folk-tune, exactly like those resulting from poetic suggestion, have undoubtedly enriched musical art.

The scholastic practice of strictly formal methods, of the tempered scale, and other causes, among which the abstract dogmas of aestheticians should not be forgotten, had resulted in the gradual disappearance of all modalities, except the major and minor, with their limited number of constitutive chords. A principle of symmetry, originally founded on the alternate periods of dance or march rhythms, was set up as a compulsory rule. Once the resources of the classical system carried to their utmost by Beethoven's extension of the symphony's tonal and formal scheme, by Wagner's chromaticism and modulatory methods, the danger would have become great, and a set of empty, pre-ordained formulæ might have come to reign over musical art and musical appreciation alike (Dr. Riemann's efforts to reduce all harmonies to major or minor triads, and to demonstrate that three-, seven-, or eleven-bar phrases are in fact eight-bar phrases with elisions or protractions, are indeed symptomatic) but for the intervening influences of poetic suggestion and folk-tune, which creative artists eagerly called to aid.

Born and cultivated far from academic centres, folk-song had preserved the old modalities, free melodic patterns, and tonal and rhythmic schemes that have proved so useful to composers of the modern period.

Of course a great deal depends upon the artist's ability to shake away convention in treatment. Compare, for instance, the use of folk-tunes by Dvorák, whose methods remain altogether academic, and by Borodin, who is one of the most original symphonists of his time. Glinka, in one of the recitatives of his opera 'Rousslan and Liudmila,' and Félicien David, in 'Le Désert,' both quote, in similar manner, a certain Eastern theme; but whereas in the former case the effect is beautiful, it remains quite commonplace in the latter, simply for lack of suitable harmonization and position.

The difficulties attending the use of folk-tune, in fact, are no less than those with which is beset the practice of programme or poetic music: and likewise, they can be solved but by actual inspiration.

This remark may help us to do away with a not uncommon objection. It is said that to resort to folk-tunes is to lessen the part of invention; that it may be little better than a petty artifice, an attempt to disguise lack of imagination. It may be all that in certain cases, no doubt: so may the strict adherence to classical methods, as well as the ceaseless quest of material in programmes. But the student will do well again to remember our preliminary caution, to take nothing for granted. In the foregoing article (Musical Times, July, p. 439), we had come to note that 'creative faculty is displayed alike in inventing a theme and in working it out, possibly even more in the working out.' We may go a step further, and say that a theme in itself is often little in comparison with the way in which a composer of genius avails himself of its possibilities. The principal motive of Beethoven's 'Eroica' is to be found in Mozart's Overture to 'Bastien et Bastienne.' The theme of César Franck's Symphony reproduces one of the most famous motives in the 'Walküre.' If the theme of Beethoven's C minor has been said to be 'the greatest theme in the world,' its supremacy lies, perhaps, less in its four notes than in all that Beethoven has drawn from them.*

We are therefore entitled to aver that by selecting in or deriving from folk-tunes motives with a clear understanding of their intrinsic fitness and of their possibilities, by availing himself well of these possibilities, an artist can display his creative gifts no less freely and fully than if he had invented his motives with or without the help of poetic suggestion. Our next step will be to study particular cases, and to examine the part played by folk-tunes in works by modern composers of different schools.

A MUSICIAN'S HOLIDAY.

To be out of one's normal life for a whole month—how strange it feels! To plunge into the most hidden recesses of this, our lovely island, and enjoy to the full its incomparable beauties, too often ignored by shallow minds! Here, in north-east Cornwall, is the luxuriant sub-tropical vegetation, a broken, almost mountainous country, a perfect climate (this year, at any rate), and withal a marvellous and holy tranquillity to be vainly sought in Switzerland or Norway. And it is in this sweet, dreamy peacefulness—not in crowded seaside resorts or on blazing golf links—that I prefer to seek recuperation after ten months of arduous labour.

Coming down in the train I was contemptuously reflecting over something I had just read: an editor had solicited the opinions of all those readers whom he could induce to answer him, as to the most suitable holiday for a musician. Their suggestions were certainly not edifying; they were mostly to the effect that he should go somewhere where he could cast aside all thoughts of music. Is the daily exercise of his chosen vocation then so irksome? They say that when an omnibus driver gets a holiday he always spends it in driving a friend's bus; I can vouch for it that when an actor gets a night off he invariably spends it at the theatre. Has the English musician less interest in his calling than the actor or the omnibus driver? or does he produce so much music that nature cries out in him for a respite? Surely not. The droning through cathedral services all and every day, the teaching of pianoforte or violin (Heaven help him!) or the nightly singing of ineane ballads—how can these labours be regarded as music? The genuine musician, whatever answer he may have given in the editorial symposium, surely looks upon his summer holiday as the only time in which he may freely practise the art to which his life is supposed to be devoted. He does what I am doing—he hides away from all distracting noises (except, perhaps, the barbaric church bell, from which there is no escape) and dreams of real, soul-satisfying music—perhaps he even dares to put it down on paper.

I remember how, many years ago, I wrote a mordant article, describing the trial of a man for the penal offence of having written a string-quartet. Suggested by the famous trial for consumption detailed in Butler's 'Erewhon,' this satire had just sufficient truth to make it very unpleasant reading, and the then editor of the Musical Times very properly declined it. It was handed round among musical friends and critics, laughed at as a good 'skit,' and forgotten. It is truer now than ever it was, but I am past such rallery, and am no longer desirous of influencing my fellows, or offering the world what it does not want. For eleven months of the year I am altruistic, and devote my best efforts to helping others; for these four weeks I revel in purely selfish enjoyment.

So, unseen of any man, I ramble all and every day through the exquisite Cornish lanes and moorlands, revolving in my mind all the masterpieces of art I have ever known—dreaming music, feeling music, steeping myself in music such as no actual human performance can make, until gradually my mind returns to the old enthusiastic condition of youthful days when music pervaded one's whole being, day and night. And then I seek a secluded nook a mile or so from my lodging, and there make a nest wherein to hatch the egg that I feel I must bring forth. Here I sit, day after day, and sketch and write and destroy and recast until, as the work gathers shape, the pen moves with more and more certainty and the delicious thrill attendant on artistic production—so long unfelt—warms my soul and I write, write, write, oblivious of the hours, of the beauties of nature, in a passion of devotion, 'the world forgetting, by the world forgot.' At last it is really done, and then comes the joy of making the fair copy with every tiny detail filled scrupulously in. But I must hasten, for the four weeks are running out at terrible speed, and I could not bear to leave the work unfinished.

What a time it has been! Neither long nor short, but a portion of a quite different life suddenly let into one's ordinary existence. It is like a honeymoon—like a dream. Is it right? Ought a human being to detach himself from the world and revel in a perfectly selfish bliss like this? Because—unto what end? In a sternly judicial frame of mind I take my score and peruse it critically. But this is really good. I feel my heart beat as I read, beat as it only does for real music. I have never done anything so good as this before. Why? I suppose this is what they mean when they talk of Inspiration: the abnormal increase in one's powers caused by exceptionally favourable circumstances. But what circumstances? I have been in lovely places before, though certainly never in such perfect weather. Does the production of a masterpiece depend, then, upon sunshine? No, for Switzerland neither produces nor inspires great works; moreover, the last time I wrote something really fine it was under the most terrible climatic conditions. Some spur is required to goad the spirit into this exalted condition, that is clear, and the condition is far removed from the normal state of being. Does this point to the reason why we dull, puritanical Britons so rarely attain to the divine state? But if so, we should also be lacking in enthusiasm for art. Is this actually the case?

Pondering these questions during my long journey back to town, I resolve upon putting the last one, at any rate, to the test immediately. I squeeze into the Queen's Hall, where a Promenade Concert is being held. It is crowded to suffocation in the cheap seats, and practically empty in the dress-circle, showing that musical enthusiasm, like dramatic, stops short at half-a-crown. The usual items are being played, the applause is unvarying—hearty, but absolutely indiscriminate. A new composition, simply consisting of a series of uncouth chords, is played. It is about as interesting as a page from a dictionary, but it receives the same welcome as Mendelssohn's Overture to 'Ruy Blas.' Then—what! another novelty?—they play a charming little Suite written by a member of the band, who obtains the usual 'call on,' and is evidently delighted beyond measure at his success. Ah, my boy, ten years hence you will look back wistfully to that fleeting triumph, and wonder why it led to nothing. But I must not say these things; people don't like it. A singer now comes on, and I go out. I know that singer. It doesn't matter how or what he or she sings. As I go up Portland Place I hear a great roar of applause which shakes the very pavement, and to which the greeting given to Wagner and Tchaikovsky were as nothing. I wend my way homeward, the question as to the Londoner's love of good music hardly settled to my satisfaction, and then . . .

Then I take up my score, read it straight through to get one last thrill of pleasure, carefully seal it up in three wrappings of brown paper, endorse it with the usual instructions to my executors, and stow it away on the top shelf of my cupboard, smiling a little ruefully to see how large the pile there has grown. To-morrow I begin teaching again: the musician's holiday is over.

EDWARD TAYLOR'S GRESHAM LECTURES.

BY W. BARCLAY SQUIRE.

As already explained in the last issue of the Musical Times, the following extracts are from the lectures delivered by Edward Taylor (1784-1863) during his tenancy of the Gresham chair of Music. The original manuscripts, preserved in the Library of the Royal College of Music, mainly consist of a series of lectures on the history of English dramatic music. The extracts given (in continuation of those published in last month's issue) have been selected on account of their interest as Taylor's personal recollections; they are arranged here in alphabetical order of the subjects treated.

JOHN DAVY.

I should not have noticed the next musical after-piece but for one song it contains, which acquired much popularity when it was first sung, and which continues to the present day, not, indeed, in its original position, but transplanted into another after-piece. The song to which I refer is 'The Bay of Biscay,' which was composed by Davy for Incledon, and formed part of the music in the entertainment called 'Spanish Dollars.' After Incledon's death, Braham introduced it into Dibdin's after-piece of 'The Waterman,' which custom has so long continued that the song is generally, though erroneously, regarded as Dibdin's. Davy was a Devonshire lad, who, having early evinced considerable talent as well as love for music, was placed for instruction under Jackson, of Exeter. He afterwards settled in London, and was engaged, in conjunction with Reeve, Moorehead, and Braham, as a writer for the stage.

MISS DE CAMP.

She was of German extraction, but was early brought by her parents into this country. Intended by them for the stage, every acquirement necessary to her success was assiduously cultivated. Her first appearance before the public was in a Ballet, when, at the early age of six years, she gave promise of future excellence in this subordinate branch of her intended profession. When only twelve years old she was engaged at Drury Lane Theatre, where she assiduously applied herself to the cultivation of every art that might contribute to success in her theatrical career. Gifted by nature with a voice of sweet tone and considerable compass, she applied herself diligently to profit by it under the instruction of a good master, and was thus enabled to sustain with credit and effect any character in which the exercise of her vocal powers might be required. . . . It happened that the first time I saw Miss De Camp (at the commencement of the present century), was in Kelly's 'Of age to-morrow,' when I was equally struck with the elegance of her figure, the expression of her features, the gracefulness of her deportment, and the excellence of her singing as well as her acting.

CHARLES DIBDIN.

Charles Dibdin occupied a position which no one before him and no one since has adventured to fill. He trod in the path of no predecessor, he had no model but nature, no prompter but a heart alive to sympathy and good nature. . . . As a writer Dibdin is careless and often incorrect, the faults of his style not unfrequently rendering his meaning obscure. He had, too, strong musical prejudices, and when he ventured beyond his depth his opinions only serve to create a smile. But native genius carried him triumphantly through a long and arduous professional career, in which he depended, during no inconsiderable portion of it, solely upon his own resources as writer, composer, singer, and player. . . . He belongs to the past, not the present, generation, and those who remember, as I do, the extraordinary power which he possessed (with very little voice) of amusing the public with a series of entertainments, of which singing formed a prominent part, must now form, I apprehend, but a small minority among the present audience.

In the year 1788 he ceased to write for the stage, and ventured on the bold, novel and hazardous experiment of giving an entertainment to the public, of which he was to provide the entire material. He wrote the whole of it, prose and poetry, narrative and song: he set every song to music, he recited, sang, and accompanied the entire entertainment. In fact everything that Dibdin produced had a character so completely original that assistance from any other quarter would have destroyed the unity and completeness of the production. He had a style of his own, careless and incorrect enough at times, but his imitators (and he had many), though able to copy some of his peculiarities, never attained those genuine touches of nature and unaffected feeling which appeared to flow from him without effort. His first attempt at an entertainment of this kind proved a complete failure. He had, by his own account, only sixteen hearers. The place of exhibition was an Auction Room in King Street, Covent Garden. . . . It was suggested to him that the place was objectionable, and he accordingly ventured to engage the Lyceum, a building at that time opened under a magistrate's license for music and dancing, but also used for purposes less rational and innocent. Here Dibdin brought out his entertainment called 'The Oddities,' which proved successful beyond his warmest expectations, having been repeated seventy-nine times. . . . Next season Dibdin produced 'The Wags,' with increased success, for it ran 108 nights. 'But,' in relating this fact, he adds 'the Lyceum became so annoying with sparring matches, wax-work, wild beasts, and Lincolnshire oxen, that I might as well have kept a booth at a fair. I determined, therefore, to have done with it. For this purpose I hired the premises at that time belonging to the Polygraphic Society and fitted up as a theatre.' Here Dibdin brought out, in succession, several of his entertainments, each of which contained from twenty to thirty songs. . . . In the year 1795, Dibdin again shifted his quarters and became the proprietor of a theatre of his own. . . . The theatre which he built stood in Leicester Place, which, when he began to occupy it, was only in part covered with houses. A small colonnade still marks its site. Borrowing its name from the Great King of Prussia's favourite residence, Dibdin called it 'Sans Souci.' . . . What I have said of Dibdin has been derived either from what he said of himself or from what others said of him. I have now to draw upon my own reminiscences and describe Dibdin as I recollect him. This was in the year 1799, in which, he says, he was from home four months, having visited forty-three places, from Glasgow to Colchester, taking Norwich in his way, where I was one of his audience. I had no little curiosity to see and hear a man so well known to the public by reputation, many of whose songs I had sung as a boy, and of whose vocal powers I had conceived a high opinion. His songs were at this time known and sung from one end of the kingdom to the other. The entertainment was called 'A Tour to the Land's End.' The place in which I heard him exhibit was a large room, in a prominent part of which his instrument was placed. This was a pianoforte of small compass, having various appendages—a few organ pipes, easily packed and removed, a triangle, a few bells, a tambourine and a gong, all of which were used as occasion might serve or require. He took his seat with the air of a person who had long been accustomed to address an audience and began the narrative of his 'Tour to the Land's End.' This was related with great ease and effect; no attempt at oratory or declamation, but simply as if he was relating his travels to a party of friends. Anecdote and song interspersed the narrative, and my impression, at the distance of more than half-a-century is that of having passed a most agreeable evening.

It was in this sort of style that he narrated his tour (the passage describes his impression of Bath, then a place of much more frequent and fashionable resort than now): 'Next day I arrived at that mixture of lowliness and grandeur, pride and meanness, politeness and impertinence—Bath, the region of fashion and dulness, of elegance and stupidity, of public reputation and private intrigue, of extravagance and imposition, where dress is the ne plus ultra of all virtue, where a graceful minuet is considered the height of human perfection, where good breeding is carried to such a pitch of refinement that sharpeners and their dupes associate harmoniously, and the foxes and geese live like one family; where Irish adventurers angle for rich heiresses, and where noblemen, prematurely decrepit, are wheeled about to drink the waters, qualify Burgundy with spruce beer, hobble to the rooms, the theatre, or the club, beat false time, scream "Bravo!" in the wrong place, and hiccup out "Non nobis Domine!" Dibdin's entertainments, I have said, were agreeably interspersed with anecdotes, many of which related to the stage, and his long connection with the managers, actors, and singers of both the great theatres stored his memory with an abundant supply. I will give one of them as a specimen. The persons to whom it refers were the principal singers at Covent Garden Theatre, and the songs mentioned were their most popular ones. (Dibdin is speaking of the practice of what is called 'making a benefit,' that is, of frequenting clubs and convivial societies for the purpose of selling tickets.)

"It was to these societies that, as a young man, I was introduced, but I never could buckle to handing about the tickets, though it was by no means considered a disreputable practice. On one of these occasions several performers were present with their tickets in their pockets, and as often as a song was sung the tickets went round. Beard and Lowe being of the party, the inferior performers had but little custom. The toast having passed round, the President vociferated: "Gentlemen, I knock down Mr. Beard for a song." The song over, "Mr. Beard," said a gentleman, "please to set me down for a box that will hold nine; there are two guineas-and-a-half and half-a-crown." "Thank you, sir," "Mr. Beard, I'll beg the favour of your toast." "Success to trade, gentlemen." "Who do you call upon, sir?" "Sir, I call upon Mr. Lowe. 'The early horn,' if you please, sir." "Bravo! When is your benefit fixed, Mr. Lowe?" "Here is a bill, sir." "Thank you, sir." "Please to give me six box tickets and change for a guinea-and-a-half." In short this traffic went regularly on, the articles falling at every bidding, like a Dutch auction. At last a man cried from the corner of the room: "I say, you Tommy Lowe, tip us 'Rise, glory, rise,' and hand us over two gallery tickets."

Such was the style of entertainment which I heard, and no doubt, of his entertainments in general. In his vocal powers I was disappointed, which were only fitted to give effect to his own songs. Although the melodies of some of these are very beautiful and demand a much better voice than he possessed to display them to advantage, yet the majority are narratives, sometimes extending to five or six long verses, and were by him recited as much as sung, that is, there was no attempt at what we call singing. Dibdin's first object by his auditors. His was what we call 'a made-up voice,' able, after a fashion, to embrace a large compass, but yet a voice of no decided scale, and destitute alike of sweetness and power. But it sufficed for what he wanted, and although I have heard his songs much better sung than he was able to sing them (reference being had to the music alone) I have never heard the same kind of effect produced by them as when he sang them himself.

... In his 'Sans Souci' Theatre Dibdin produced, after the 'Tour to the Land's End,' the several entertainments of 'Tom Wilkins,' 'The Cake House,' and 'The Frisk,' intending with the latter to close his professional career, dispose of his theatre, sell off his large stock of plates and copyrights, and retire into private life. In this intention he was disappointed, being unable to realize what he regarded as their value. No doubt he overrated it, for most of his songs required his own peculiar manner and variety of talent to make them effective. ... Unable, therefore, to accomplish his design, he produced another entertainment, which he called 'Most Votes,' and which, I believe, was his last. ... Of the rest of his career nothing remains to be told that can give pleasure in the recital. ... Half a century has passed since Dibdin took his leave of the public, and the few who can say, with me, 'I have heard him,' will soon follow him. ... In the exercise of his various talents there was one of the cardinal virtues he neglected to practise—prudence. He spent his money as fast as he earned it, and as a necessary consequence when unable to earn he had no money to spend. A pension was given him as a reward for the nautical songs he had written. ... But this was taken away, and the pitiful parsimony of a subsequent administration left him to end his days in comparative penury. He died in the year 1814. Some of Dibdin's admirers suggested that a monument to his memory should be placed in the Chapel of Greenwich Hospital. ... in aid of it a performance was given at Covent Garden Theatre, at which I had the pleasure of assisting. ... The evening's entertainment concluded with 'The Padlock,' and when I was in the Green Room, seated between Mrs. Davenport, dressed for Ursula, and my old friend Blanchard, dressed for Mungo, our conversation naturally turned upon Dibdin. Mrs. Davenport related an instance of the extraordinary facility with which he wrote the words of his songs, which I will give, as nearly as possible, in her own words:—"I went to Ealing, where Mr. Dibdin then lived, to dine with him, for I had always kept up some intimacy with him ever since we were at Covent Garden Theatre together. It was a quiet family party, and when the servant came to lay the cloth for dinner, Dibdin went into the garden, round which he continued to walk till dinner was announced. On entering the room he said: "I have written a song since I left you," and after dinner he repeated it. The song was "True Courage."

I have now to speak of Dibdin in the character of a musician. He was a native of Hampshire and was brought up at Winchester. It does not appear that he was ever a regular member of the choir there, although he speaks of having been taught the gamut by Mr. Fussell, then organist of the Cathedral, and of having sung some anthems, expressly composed for him by Kent, who was Fussell's predecessor. From the latter he received as much instruction on the harpsichord as enabled him to play 'God save the King,' and 'Footie's Minuet,' and was accustomed to exhibit his vocal powers, as a boy, at the Winchester concerts. When his voice changed he went to London, where he was introduced to Dr. Arne and Mr. Beard, and by them to the Catch Club. Without any regular instruction in the art of composition, he attempted to score Arne's after-piece, 'Thomas and Sally,' from memory. He soon found himself entangled in difficulties and the perpetration of errors, and in order to feel his way more securely he studied Rameau's Treatise on Harmony, and at the same time applied himself to an exercise from which he derived more practical advantage than from Rameau's exploded theory. This was to reduce Corelli's Concertos to score from the single parts, and thus thoroughly to study the structure of these admirable compositions. ... It is evident that Dibdin never troubled himself to acquire more than a superficial knowledge of counterpoint. He admits this in the course of his professional life. ... He evidently was often at a loss to know how to write a correct bass to his own melodies. He was a melodist, not a musician. In the former character he had few equals in the style to which he exclusively devoted himself.

MRS. DICKONS.

It was in this opera [Shield's 'Woodman'] that Miss Poole made her first appearance and established her reputation. She had given very early indications of musical talent, and was well instructed in her art. She afterwards appeared with success both at the Antient Concerts and the Italian Opera. After her marriage she retired, for some time, from the profession, but subsequently, from the most praiseworthy motives, returned to it, and probably some of my hearers may remember her under her married name—Mrs. Dickons. I had, several times, the pleasure of singing with her in public, and I never knew a lady (Mrs. Billington excepted) whose knowledge of her art was so correct and extensive, and whose acquaintance with every style of vocal music—ancient and modern, English and Italian—was so accurate.

CHARLES DIGNUM.

As an actor he was nothing: just able to walk through his part, and that was all. He had an agreeable voice, but not the happiest method of using it. He was much engaged in dinner-singing, and had what is called 'a good City connection.' Perhaps as a necessary consequence he loved good living, and he was especially reputed to evince a decided attachment to turtle. Be this as it might, he certainly sang as if a portion of his favourite dish was in his mouth. Bating this defect he was an agreeable ballad-singer, and having but little knowledge of music, he wisely refrained from attempting any of the higher displays of the vocal art.

The following song ['Our Country is our ship,' in Storace's 'Cherokee'], written for Dignum, was, of necessity, an English ballad. Diggy, as his comrades called him, was master of no other style, and whoever wrote for him was compelled to have regard to his vocal capabilities, which might be summed up—a voice of pleasing tone, limited compass, and very scanty musical knowledge. His character in the 'Cherokee,' was a sailor . . . Dignum, probably, had never seen a ship out of the Thames, and the only atmosphere in which he breathed with true enjoyment was that of a City Hall at a Livery Dinner. Perhaps no man before or since has formed so extensive an acquaintance with these edifices as Charles Dignum.

CHARLES INCLEDON.

Charles Incledon was a native of Cornwall, the son of a respectable surgeon at St. Kewan in that county. Being gifted with a fine voice as a boy, his father procured his admission into the choir of Exeter Cathedral. His first master took but little pains with the boys, but when he was succeeded by Jackson, a more favourable opportunity was afforded for the development of his powers, although I suspect that Jackson never troubled himself to make his boys singers, but rather taught them to sing his own compositions for the Church (which are very poor of their kind) according to his own taste. Accident threw young Incledon into the company of naval men, and at the expiration of his cathedral servitude he had become so enamoured of a sailor's life that he enlisted on board the 'Formidable,' a 98-gun ship, where he remained until he obtained a berth on board the 'Raisable' frigate, in which he went to the West Indies as a common sailor. That Nelson and Incledon were serving on board the same ship is certain, that they were there at the same time is probable. Nelson began his splendid career on board the 'Raisable,' and the difference in their ages was only a few years, Incledon being the younger. It seems likely, therefore, that the conjecture I have hazarded is founded on fact. While in the Navy Incledon was in three engagements, and at the expiration of the war he was discharged with letters of recommendation from Lord Mulgrave, Lord Hervey, and Admiral Pigott. Encouraged by his friends and relying on the powers which nature had given him, he applied for an engagement at the Haymarket. Colman (then proprietor and manager of this theatre) heard and rejected him. After one or two more disappointments he made his début at Southampton, as Alphonso, in the 'Castle of Andalusia.' Thence he went to Bath, where he remained several years, during which time the Catch Club, under the direction of Dr. Harrington, had attained its highest degree of eminence and prosperity. Here Incledon was a welcome guest, not as an assistant in part-music, for in this he never shone, but as a singer of the songs of our best English melodists. Rauzzini was at this time living in Bath, from whom (according to some accounts of Incledon's early career) he received regular musical instruction. This statement I altogether doubt. Incledon was a regular John Bull. His dislike of foreigners and his contempt for Italian singers he never was at any pains to conceal. Besides, if he had consented to place himself under one of them for instruction, some effect of this training would have appeared. . . . He never could have been under so eminent a teacher for several years without, at least, acquiring the power of reading from notes with facility, which he never possessed. This was well known to all his brethren in the profession, and my late friend, Mr. Joseph Major, who composed several songs for him and who was his accompanist on the pianoforte in some of the musical entertainments which Incledon gave towards the end of his career, described to me the process by which he learned his songs. When a new opera was to be brought out, he would take the music to Major, having himself only a copy of the words. Major would seat himself at the pianoforte, sing and play the song, while Incledon walked about the room. His ear was so quick and his memory so retentive, that after a few times hearing the melody, he would say: 'Now, Joe, here goes!' and the song was frequently sung without alteration or mistake. Shield, who was then the composer to Covent Garden Theatre, knew both Incledon's capabilities and his deficiencies, and hence he seldom employed him in concerted pieces of any intricacy.

From my own recollections of Incledon, therefore, as well as from the testimony of his professional contemporaries, I conclude that to education he owed nothing beyond what the regular duty of a boy in a country Cathedral, performed under an inattentive master, would confer, but to nature all the rest. And never did nature pour out her vocal gifts more profusely than on Charles Incledon. His voice combined every excellence of which the vocal organ is capable. Powerful, brilliant, melodious, sweet, liquid, and rich, it flowed like a torrent, while its correct intonation made its most subdued tones effective. His voice was a legitimate tenor of great compass, to which he added a falsetto of considerable power and extent, while his bass notes had more power and fineness than legitimate tenor voices usually possess, so that he never seemed to be distressed by the compass of a song, high or low. He sang, on the contrary, as if it seemed a pleasure to pour forth the full tones of his fine, manly voice. I have said that nature formed Incledon a singer, and his style of singing was altogether his own. He was the creature of impulse, frank, open, and outspoken, no matter where or to whom, hence the expression he gave to his songs was simply dictated by his feelings; it was sometimes exaggerated (for the possession of such a voice would lead to this fault), but seldom wrong. No one could have taught him the style of his singing. Take, for example, 'The Storm.' This song was written before Incledon was born, and probably was sung, but it was unknown till Incledon showed what was in it, made it his exclusive property, and completely identified himself with it. Here his early sailor's life came in aid of his vocal powers, and when he sprang on to the stage, dressed for the song (or rather as he made it the scene), which he always sang without any accompaniment, he looked 'every inch a sailor.' Who that has heard it will ever forget his thrilling exclamation 'She rights, she rights, boys!' and then his look and attitude as, on bended knees, and with upraised hands, he thanked Heaven for his deliverance. It required a singer of his acute feeling to venture on such an experiment, and of his power and compass to give it effect, but nature prompted him and carried him triumphantly through. This performance alone is sufficient to stamp Incledon, as a ballad-singer, as unrivalled. He sang it for thirty years with no decline of popularity. It was always the most attractive display of his powers, that on which he might reckon with unflinching certainty of success. In almost every town in the United Kingdom, as well as across the Atlantic, Charles Incledon's name and fame were associated with 'The Storm.' But with him the song died; no singer has attempted it, although it ensured to Incledon a degree of popularity unrivalled. The fact is decisive of his extraordinary powers.

The next song ['The Streamlet,' from Shield's 'Woodman'] carries me back more than sixty years. It was the first song I ever heard Incledon sing, but, though a mere boy, the beauty of the melody, aided by the splendour of Incledon's voice, fixed it at once in my memory, where it has remained ever since. Some years elapsed before I was able to test the accuracy of my recollection by a reference to the notes, but I found that it had not deceived me. Shield and Incledon combined had made too strong an impression to render this possible. I still regard it as one of the most perfect specimens of the English ballad that ever was written.

INCLEDON, KELLY, AND HARRISON.

At the time of which I am now speaking [1794] there were three tenor singers in their prime—Incledon, Kelly, and Harrison—each moving in a different sphere, yet all, occasionally, occupying the same ground. If you were merely to look at the songs sung by the two former, the impression would probably be that they possessed voices of the same compass and quality, and that each could have sung, with credit and success, the songs written for the other. But my remembrance of both enables me to say that there could not be a greater mistake. Incledon was all nature; Kelly, altogether art. Incledon's voice was at once rich, sweet, powerful, and extensive; Kelly's was a thin, made-up voice, which in Italy he had learned to manage with considerable skill, and to use to the best advantage. Some of Incledon's most celebrated and popular songs he sung without any accompaniment, but this was an effort Kelly never dared to make. His weak points were hidden by a busy and clever accompaniment, and he was never more applauded than when ending a song with the hackneyed Italian close, in which his voice was drowned by the fortissimo of the orchestra. Harrison was wholly unlike either of his eminent contemporaries. He was a compound of nature and art. The former had gifted him with a voice whose characteristic was sweetness, and from the latter he had acquired the skill of extending with faultless purity all that came within its range. The tone of his voice at once charmed and captivated his hearers. When I first heard Harrison, it was in the opening of the 'Messiah,' and after an interval of more than fifty years the peculiar sweetness of his tone is quite fresh in my remembrance. His 'Comfort ye, My people' was like a message of mercy to Israel uttered by the voice of an angel. But here centred his sole excellence. He stood and looked like a marble statue. He seemed to possess not a particle of enthusiasm, and his countenance expressed no feeling or passion. His style was pure, but nothing more. He never, willingly, ventured to encounter any song which had to express violent or conflicting emotion. He knew the position nature had assigned him, and he never quitted it but with reluctance. When compelled to do so he was sure to fail. Handel's quiet tenor songs were exactly suited to his powers, but when endeavouring to encounter the vigour and fire of Purcell his physical and mental powers were unequal to the trial. Such are my reminiscences of the three celebrated tenor singers of their day.

MRS. JORDAN.

Of all the actresses I have ever seen there is not one of whose powers I should find it so impossible to convey an adequate description as those of Mrs. Jordan. She was the very impersonation of cheerfulness and good humour. Her beautiful compact figure, the elasticity of her step, her features radiant with joyousness, her sparkling eyes, her joyous smile and her bewitching voice were so many gifts which nature had showered upon her, and had also added the power of employing them to the best advantage on the stage. Her presence there seemed to inspire in her auditors the good humour that beamed from her eye. Nor did her acting exhibit the result of art, but appeared rather the inspiration of nature. It seemed as if she had bestowed no study upon her favourite and best characters, but rather as if the habit, gestures, dialect, and manner of the person she represented were in reality her own. Never within my recollection had the public such a favourite. They admired Mrs. Siddons but they loved Mrs. Jordan.

MICHAEL KELLY.

I first heard him in the year 1800, when he was little more than forty years old, and his voice, consequently, unimpaired by age. I was astonished to find the Mr. Kelly, whose name was so familiar to me, . . . destitute of the first requisite of a singer. His voice was wiry, unpleasant, and feeble. His style was good, and what little power nature had given him he used skilfully, but nature never designed Kelly for a singer.

His knowledge of music was very slender and extended little further than the ability (which every resident in Italy seems to acquire) to write a melody sometimes one degree removed from insipidity, and it was always supposed that in his most successful efforts he drew upon his memory rather than his invention. He discreetly avoided attempting the production of a legitimate opera, and contented himself with furnishing the music incidental to the showy exhibitions which were then in especial favour with the public, such as 'Blue Beard,' 'The Castle Spectre,' 'The Wood Demon,' and 'Pizarro.'

[For 'Blue Beard'] George Colman was engaged to find the words (which he did in less than a week) and Kelly to supply the music. It was brought out with the greatest splendour and magnificence, and by the aid of scene-painters and decorators and with the help of its mysteries, horrors, processions, marches, combats, and appalling situations, it answered its intended purpose. The public flocked to see it, and the treasury of the theatre was replenished. The music was that of a man who had long been familiar with the stage, possessing little invention, originality, or science, but whose early training in Italy enabled him to produce, with very little effort, a pleasing melody. . . . The concerted pieces and choruses . . . are of the most commonplace character—a sad decline from the masterly compositions of Storace. They were fitly described by a German musician then in the Drury Lane orchestra: 'I could play the bass mid von vinger; it is all D, A, D, A, D, A; and, for a vunder, C.'

ORCHESTRAS IN 1796-1799.

From 1796 to 1799 . . . the two great metropolitan theatres were well supplied with all the requisites for an efficient performance of the English opera. At Drury Lane the composers were, up to this time, Storace and Attwood; at Covent Garden Shield, and occasionally Dr. Arnold. Each theatre possessed singers of eminence and each orchestra was strengthened and enriched by additional instruments, especially wind instruments, the latter having been chiefly brought into use by Storace and Attwood, both of whom had studied under Mozart at Vienna. . . . The two Parkes, on the flute and oboe, Mahon on the clarinet, and Parkinson on the bassoon, were excellent players. The compass of the flute has of late years been much extended, but the oboe and the clarinet are what they were fifty years ago. Parkinson was the first of a succession of English bassoon players whose chief aim and excellence was the acquirement of a full, round, rich tone, in which the vibration of the reed should not be heard. This fine characteristic of the instrument was preserved by Holmes, Denman, and Mackintosh. It is now lost. Tone has been sacrificed to more rapid execution, and a more flexible reed has been substituted to attain it.

Among the principal stringed instrument players may be named Shaw, the leader of the Drury Lane orchestra, and Mountain, who occupied the same position at Covent Garden; Eley, who was the principal violoncello at Drury Lane, was an excellent player, and the talent of all these performers was frequently employed in obligato accompaniments on their respective instruments.

SEDGWICK.

This song [Storace's 'There the silver'd waters roam,' in 'The Pirates'] was originally written for and sung by Sedgwick, to whose powers it was admirably adapted. I remember him well, and have not forgotten the impression his magnificent voice made upon me. It was a fine full-toned, legitimate bass, with a compass extending clearly and easily to G. He was no musician and no actor. He was drilled into everything he had to sing by ear, and he was never heard except at Drury Lane Theatre and at some convivial societies.

Occasional Notes.

Henry Thomas Smart was born in Foley Place (now Langham Street), London. W., on October 26, 1813. He died at 30, King Henry's Road, Hampstead, on July 7, 1879, and was buried in Hampstead Cemetery. Whatever the present value of his numerous compositions when assessed from the standpoint of modern musical criticism, it cannot be gainsaid that they fulfilled and still fulfil a useful purpose, and will probably continue to do so while melody and natural harmony hold their sway. A full sketch of Smart's career and portrait of the composer were given in our issue for May, 1902.

Another centenary that happens this month is that of Verdi, who was born on October 10, 1813, and died on January 27, 1901. We shall have more to say next month as to this world-famed composer in connection with the centenary celebrations that are at this time taking place on the Continent and elsewhere.

The programme of the London Symphony Orchestra for the season 1913-14 is a blow for British music. Twelve Symphony concerts are announced, which will be conducted by Fritz Steinbach, Emil Mlynarski, Wassili Safonoff, W. Mengelberg, and Arthur Nikisch, and of the fifty or so pieces to be performed, not one is by a British composer. But living foreign composers do not come off much better, for Strauss and Saint-Saëns alone represent them. The directors state boldly that it is found that new music does not draw, and that they design to give audiences what they want. We are not disposed to be censorious on the attitude of a body that on the whole has done so much for the art in this country and abroad. But we venture to suggest that the policy announced is too drastic. Surely it would have been possible to have included a few specimens of British music without repelling audiences? What has most to be deplored is the effect of such a boycott on the musical world generally.

In striking contrast to the season's programme of the London Symphony Orchestra is that of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Novelty and other modern or unfamiliar works are promised in plenty by the go-ahead organization conducted by Sir Henry Wood. The most 'newsy' of the events foreshadowed is the coming, on January 17, of the arch-enemy—or prophet—of musical sound, Arnold Schönberg. He is to conduct a performance of the 'Five Characteristic Pieces' that, when played at last season's Promenade Concerts, created so great an uproar. The novelty on October 18 will be Scriabine's third Symphony. In the course of the eight concerts (the dates of which are given on p. 662), the works to attract attention will be, besides the above, Max Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style' (Op. 123), Moussorgsky's 'Une nuit sur le mont chauve,' Sir Hubert Parry's 'fifth Symphony in B minor, Ravel's 'Rapsodie Espagnole,' Berlioz's 'Symphonie Fantastique,' Glinka's 'Kamarinskaya,' Mahler's ninth Symphony, Strauss's Overtures to 'Le bourgeois gentilhomme'; and 'Ariadne auf Naxos,' a new orchestral fantasia, 'Fireworks,' by Stravinsky, Delius's 'Dance Rhapsodie,' and Brahms's first and fourth Symphonies will also be heard.

Mr. G. Ainslie Hight (of Samer, Pas de Calais) writes to us as follows:

Mr. Newman, in his note on my letter in your issue of September 1, does not reply to my question. Whatever he may have intended to suggest by his remark that few could refrain from a smile at Wagner's describing his relations with Mathilde Wesendonck as 'purely friendly,' he must know very well what every reader will have understood by it. It is a sufficient answer to point out that their friendship was known to and permitted by her husband. Those who wish to judge of it may read their published letters, especially the last long letter which Wagner addressed to her before they parted (No. 55) in the summer of 1858, and the letter to his sister Clara of August 20, 1858, bearing in mind that these were written at the time of greatest stress, and were certainly intended for no eyes but those of the persons to whom they were addressed. Each will then, according to the light that is given to him, know what to think of Mr. Newman's innuendo.

I am happy to find myself heartily in agreement with Mr. Newman on one point. No person who had any acquaintance with Wagner's character would think of representing him as a 'saint.' I do not know to whom Mr. Newman particularly refers, but if there is such a one he would, I should think, be out of consideration through sheer ignorance. Wagner's character was, as he rightly says, endlessly complex and interesting. If Mr. Newman's book is—as I gather that he intends it to be—an endeavour to reveal the humanity of his nature, I wish him every success. Such a work by a competent hand would be valuable. But Mr. Newman will have to work on very different lines from those which he has followed hitherto. Neither Friederike Meyer nor Mathilde Maier, nor the maidservant Marie, nor the grievances of Baron von Hornstein, have the smallest interest for any serious student of Wagner. Nor is the Autobiography either so important or so unvarnished a work as he thinks it is; nor was it an attempt to impose a tradition upon the public, since it was not written for publication at all.

Mr. Newman replies as follows:

Apparently it is no use trying to reassure Mr. Hight; the bee in his bonnet buzzes too persistently for him to be able to hear the still small voice of reason. He chose to read into a remark in my article an innuendo as to the relations between Wagner and Frau Wesendonck. I assured him that I intended no such innuendo, as I had no information on the matter. In spite of this assurance he reiterates his suspicion. As he is determined to have a grievance whatever I may say, I must just leave him with it. To your readers in general perhaps I may be permitted to say that the subject of Wagner's love affairs is too ample a one for discussion in your correspondence column, but that it will be found treated in detail in my forthcoming book. As to Frau Wesendonck, I can only repeat that no one who knows the facts can help smiling at Wagner's statement in 'Mein Leben' that his relations with that lady were 'merely friendly.' Let me put a supposititious parallel case. Suppose I were to write passionate letters to one Polly Walker, letters full of ardent protestations of love and terms of endearment; suppose I were to remind Polly in one of these letters how, on a certain day, she placed her arms about me and said she loved me; suppose I had expressed the fervent hope that I might die in her arms, and so on, and so on; and then suppose that in my memoirs—written at a time when I had no idea these letters would ever be published—I described my relations with the said Polly as 'merely friendly.' Would not a smile steal over the face of most people?

The second paragraph of Mr. Hight's letter is typical of the school to which he belongs. Their plan of reconstructing a man from his life and letters is to leave out all that does not square with their preconceived notion of him. Some of us prefer to make an attempt to see him as he really was.

Two final remarks. When Mr. Hight tells us that 'Mein Leben' was not written for publication, he must excuse my smiling once more. Apart from the inherent improbability of that theory, it is negated by Wagner's own preface to the book. And when Mr. Hight says that the autobiography is not so unvarnished as I think it is, I would point out that he cannot possibly yet know to what extent I think it unvarnished, or what evidence I shall adduce in support of my belief.

A. K. writes:

'The other day, when on a steamer in German waters, I was astonished to hear:

in a childish treble from a little boy whose parents were trying to rouse him from slumber. I was sufficiently interested to enter into conversation with the parents, and found they came from Leipzig, and satisfied myself that the odds against the child ever having heard or seen Fafner were incalculably large. Whether Saxon children usually infect their voices in this way, and whether it was in Wagner's case a conscious or an unconscious reminiscence, the incident seems to me of sufficient interest to be put on record.'

We have received the following, from which we omit the writer's name and address :

SIR,—In the August issue of the Musical Times, under the heading, 'Next season's novelties,' appears a quotation, a few bars in length, of the theme from 'Symphonic variations on an original theme,' by Johann Thompson, as follows :

In the course of his notes on the above, the reviewer says: 'It is Mr. Thompson's ability to evolve such typically British strains as these,—great tunes, racy of the soil—that has made his name honoured in America, Europe, everywhere, in fact, but in his own country,' &c. It was impossible for me not immediately to call to mind, on reading the theme, its almost exact resemblance to the music hall song so much sung and whistled by the man and boy in the street—'Let's all go down the Strand'—the first bars of which I quote :

This is only one of many indications that the article in question was taken quite seriously. The fact would seem to imply that our contributor's jest was so much like earnest as to deceive. Or can it be that an unexpectedly large number of our musicians are deficient in a sense of humour? If so, some help must be provided,—such as an intimation that the matter is supposed to be humorous, or a few explanatory paragraphs.

The city of Frankfort is indebted to M. Nicolas Manskopf for a musical museum of exceptional interest. M. Manskopf has brought together a great number of rare and extraordinary documents connected with celebrated musicians and with musical history in general. The collection of portraits, autographs, medals, scores, theatre bills of important premieres, and so forth is probably unrivalled. The Berlioz centenary was celebrated by M. Manskopf with a special exhibition of documents relating to the composer. The 150th anniversary of Mozart's birth was similarly commemorated. Last month a special exhibition was opened to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the death of Grétry, a number of whose unpublished works and letters exist in the museum. In manuscripts connected with this composer, even the Grétry museum at Liège is surpassed by M. Manskopf's collection.

With reference to a general complaint as to the inconvenience of the seating arrangements at Queen's Hall, voiced in our Occasional Notes last month (page 585), we are glad to receive the following letter from Messrs. Chappell & Co., lessees of the Hall :

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your 'Occasional Note' upon the seating accommodation at Queen's Hall, your readers may be interested to know that we have already arranged for an entirely new form of seating upon the Stall floor of the Queen's Hall for this next autumn season, and hope, during the next summer vacation, to entirely remodel the seating of the Grand Circle, so as to get rid of the lack of space at present existing between the rows of seats on the Grand Circle tier.

We are, yours faithfully,

SOME REFLECTIONS ON MODERN MUSICAL CRITICISM.

By P. A. HESELTINE.

'The good critic,' wrote Anatole France, 'is he who narrates the adventures of his mind among master-pieces'—a significant phrase, which, if supplemented by a motto from Nietzsche, 'No good, no bad, but my taste, for which I have neither shame nor concealment,' forms the foundation of a complete philosophy of musical criticism.

Such a system, be it said at once, would probably be discredited by the majority of present-day musicians, though many work upon it already: unadmittedly, it is true, for the most part, and perhaps unwittingly. However, the sooner this principle is openly admitted and practised, the better for musical criticism and the public that is supposed to profit by it; for, frankly, the ever-recurring spectacle of critics who, being totally unable to keep pace with the musical thought of their day, seek to conceal their obtuseness by a lofty cynicism and feeble attempts at humour, is becoming monotonous, to say the least of it. The only humour of the situation lies in their own attitude; for what, after all, is the musical æsthetic if it is not that intuitive feeling for music implanted in the individual, the feeling of the merits or defects of a work, even if heart and reason be at variance on the subject? This instinctive feeling for a work is, in reality, the mirror of its creation, and almost amounts to a creation in itself, for it is the reflex action of a creative will that has achieved its expression, upon a sympathetic temperament whose desire to translate its dreams into the realities of art lacks a voice of its own, finding the vague thoughts it would utter reflected, or rather, transfigured and transcended by the voices of others of a kindred nature that have become articulate.

In the same way, a work that is antipathetic in feeling to the mood or temperament of a particular hearer, evokes the thought that even its expressed reality is inferior to the shadowy, unborn dreams that haunt his mind. As was hinted above, this power of feeling a work has its roots entirely in the idiosyncrasies of temperament and their resultant moods and tastes.

The time has long passed when freedom of thought in music was suppressed by a kind of superstitious adherence to certain arbitrary rules and regulations, in spite of the belated bleatings—now becoming pathetically weak-voiced and unsupported—of the musically dead who deplore the 'licentiousness' of modern music, and sigh for the good old days when Haydn reigned supreme, or even make bold to deny the name of music to the works of those 20th century composers whose musical genealogies they happen to be unable to trace back to Jubal. They should, perhaps, be reminded that there are, no doubt, persons who would see no necessary connection between the grown plant and its bulb—there certainly is not much resemblance between the two when viewed side by side—but such people would scarcely be mistaken for horticulturists, though they might take the greatest delight in the æsthetic beauty of flowers. Even those who condescend to permit their contemporaries to express themselves through a musical medium at all, are prone to forget that all the precious rules and regulations which are so dear to them, were only compiled by musical grammarians from the study of musical works already in existence. Moreover, considering the date of the matter, if not of its presentation, the average text-book of harmony or counterpoint is about as useful to the aspiring composer of the present day as an English grammar based on Chaucer and his predecessors would be to the modern author. Besides, a knowledge of grammar, even of the right kind, does not make an author, and as regards this so-called musical grammar, it appears to be an open question whether the acquisition of it is not actually a hindrance to natural musical expression, if we may accept the opinions of those who have attained the end to which it is professedly a (or does it call itself the?) means.*

We do not imply contempt for Chaucer by admiring Shelley, and there seems to be no obvious reason why the followers of Mr. John Masefield should deny the name of poetry to the works of Milton. The space of time by which these writers are separated precludes comparison. Yet Mr. Corder, in his letter to the Musical Times of March, 1913, would have us believe that 'if Scriabine's "Prometheus" is music, then it is idle to pretend that the other works (Beethoven's Violin concerto and a Symphony by Haydn) are also music.'

In other words, if 'The vision of Piers Plowman' is poetry, then it is idle to pretend that works by Browning or Swinburne are also poetry; or, if Robert Burns wrote poetry, then William Barnes did not; or, to extend the analogy a step further, if the 'Odyssey' is an epic poem, then it is idle to classify 'Paradise Lost' under the same heading.

Mr. Corder would fain proceed to show that the introduction of psychology or expression of personality into music was a recent innovation, and tended to the decadence of the art. If he is really prepared to maintain that the music of Haydn or Beethoven contains no expression of its composer's personality, well—there is simply no more to be said. He that hath ears to hear—simply will hear; that is all.

As for the taste that accepts Haydn and Beethoven and rejects Scriabine, or vice versa, we cannot blame it, any more than we can blame any other taste under the sun, per se, for we must realise that the necessary antecedent to the possibility of such a condemnation would be a fixed standard of objective beauty, which, as a matter of plain fact, simply does not exist. 'No one yet knoweth what is good and bad,' said Zarathustra. Observe the word knoweth. The truth of Nietzsche's observation lies just in the very fact that everyone knows in his inmost heart what is good and bad, or rather, to use a Socratean distinction, thinks he knows, knowing in reality nothing whatever.

The theory of a finite and absolute standard of beauty is the supreme obstacle to the progress of musical evolution. Every standard of beauty must necessarily lie in the taste of the individual, or, as Thomas Hardy has it, 'Beauty, to all who have felt, lies not in the thing, but in what the thing symbolises.' It would be as absurd to call anyone unmusical because the music of Schönberg or Scriabine meant more to him than that of Haydn or Beethoven, as it would be to call Mr. Corder unmusical for the taste he has professed in his letter to the Musical Times. So far from there being any necessary antagonism between the two predilections, one can picture the devotee of Schönberg or Scriabine cheerfully confronting Mr. Corder with the optimistic assurance that 'I am right, and you are right, and all is right as right can be.' Flippant as it may appear, this remark voices a very profound truth in aesthetics. Substitute any other four composers for the names mentioned above for the sake of examples, and you still have four men, possibly of widely differing temperaments, yet human beings for all that, expressing themselves as best they can with the means at their disposal, in terms of music. Let Schönberg be their spokesman, for his words apply equally well to all. 'The artist does, not what others consider beautiful, but what himself is a necessity.' The facts that music is by far the youngest of the arts, and that the gradual, and perhaps still incomplete development of technical resources of all kinds has undoubtedly influenced the music of all ages to a very large extent, may be laid aside in a purely æsthetic consideration and comparison of musical works of different epochs. Human nature remains the same throughout the ages—fundamentally, that is, for the progress of civilization and the surface changes it effects will never cease—and it is, after all, the human note in every kind of music that makes the strongest appeal to human hearts. To quote Schönberg once again: 'Instruction, if it is to be of real value to the artist, must be of such a kind as helps him to hear himself. Mere technical knowledge will avail him nothing.'

This is the key-note of all originality in music—that is, the true, natural originality that distinguishes the individual from the mass, and which alone makes progress in musical expression possible. There are some, of course, who immediately associate deliberate eccentricity with any manifestation or attempt at originality in music; the distinction between mere eccentricity and true originality lies solely in the sincerity of purpose with which the music is written. Strictly speaking, there is more to be said for this imputation of eccentricity to really original music than would appear at first sight, though in this sense the term would carry no stigma. For what, after all, is eccentricity but an attitude of nonconformity with certain established traditions and customs, the courage to stand out above the herd and its conventionalities? 'The strongest man,' wrote Ibsen, 'is he who stands alone.' But he is always an eccentric to the crowd, if not a madman. If it were not for this attitude, there would be no art whatever, or if there were, we should be deluged with innumerable works—for everyone in the world would turn creator of them—all as totally indistinguishable from each other as the nails or screws turned out by any two men in the ordinary mechanical workshop.

Music, as a live and creative art, cannot stand still and stagnate; whether one considers it to be progressing in an ascending or descending line is, of course, a matter of opinion, but as soon as the course of its progress is arrested, it will assuredly perish as a living art. So long as human nature remains what it is, it will be ever striving, however ineffectually, to pierce the veil of transcendental things, and express at least a 'Dim vision of the rainbow-aureoled face

Of her whom men name Beauty,'

the elusive ideal which soars but the higher into infinity as each more clear-sighted and lovely dream of it is wrought into substance by the mind of man. Each man's only true standard of art is his glimmering perception of this vision.

The game of 'Artists and Critics' seems to have consisted for a very long time solely in the diverting though somewhat ineffectual pastime of submitting new values to the judgment of the old which they have supplanted. The motor-car is the logical outcome of the coach-and-four in the sense that it is equally the expression of man's desire for rapid transit. There are, doubtless, centenarians, and even others, whose taste does not permit of their riding in motor-cars; there is absolutely no reason why they should do so against their inclination, but it is quite absurd for them to inveigh against the modern motorist for not sharing their taste in conveyances. But here is the old, old threadbare story once again repeating itself, the old, old fear of, or contempt for, progress. The majority of music-lovers are taught to swallow in their infancy certain tenets of faith which have given birth to the grisly chimera of the fixed standard, that most terrible of all the obstacles that beset the path of the creative artist who has the courage of his tastes, and dares to cast aside all the shackles of tradition. Thus, too, comes about the appalling dearth of originality in criticism. If some music-lovers sincerely prefer Schönberg or Scriabine, or any other composers of their own age, to Haydn and Beethoven—(an ugly thought, this, for the academics, but nevertheless a very real fact that they must face sooner or later)—why should they not openly say so, especially if they are critics by profession? The natural development of musical taste is, without a doubt, vastly impeded by traditional opinions of critics of the past which survive to-day in those of weakling dilettantes who have no opinions of their own, and are hidebound by the conventional attitude towards certain composers, standing in awe before the purely arbitrary pedestals upon which the said composers have been placed. Before a tribunal composed of such people as these—and their number is fearfully great—every new work is, so to say, guilty until it is proved innocent—of originality, that is! Thus comes it about that 20th century works of tremendous significance, like the large choral works of Frederick Delius, to cite but one name among many, are treated with complacent neglect, in spite of the immense enthusiasm evoked by them whenever any of the rare performances of them take place, whereas the discovery of a work like the 'Jena Symphony,' which, judged purely on its own merits, would never have been disturbed from its slumber into oblivion, creates a feverish excitement in the musical world because somebody conjectures that it may be a student-work of Beethoven's.

There are thousands of earnest music-lovers who are constantly perplexed by the question, Where experts disagree, who shall decide? What need is there of a decision? The man who cannot think for himself cannot appreciate for himself; and nobody can appreciate for him. As M. Calvocoressi wisely points out in the Musical Times of March, 1913, it is impossible to become familiar with, let alone to appreciate, all the music that is extant in the world, and it is a regrettable fact that attention to the kind of antediluvian criticism referred to above has created a tendency among ordinary music-lovers* to be ashamed of their true tastes, and thus to attempt too much in trying to appreciate styles of music which make no natural appeal to them, while at the same time their real feeling will not allow them to neglect the study of the particular kind of music that is akin in spirit to their peculiar temperaments.

The chief danger of modern critics, both amateur and professional, seems to lie in this futile attempt at over-comprehensiveness. Mr. Ernest Newman recently made some shrewd remarks respecting a compulsory 'time-limit' for critics.† If a man of genius like Berlioz, himself a revolutionary, had perforce to confess in his latter years that he could make nothing of the Prelude to 'Tristan,' which seems to us now as clear and simple as most of Berlioz's own work, it is scarcely probable that the ordinary music-lover of the present day will be able fully to comprehend and appreciate all the countless styles of music that he will encounter. Let him feast at the banquet of the Muses as he will, and let no one attempt to coerce his taste—for is not the fact of his having taste the sole qualification for his admission to the said banquet? But let him remember that enough is as good as a feast, and beware of musical dyspepsy.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLETE ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

1. OF VOLUNTARIES—continued.

While comparatively few organists play set pieces for in-voluntaries, practically all perform the task of what is not too happily known as 'playing the people out.' Perhaps the phrase was originally used satirically. Those who know the delightful letters of Mendelssohn will recall his quotation from the postlude he heard in that land of song—and bad music—Italy. 'This,' he says, 'is what the fellow was playing':

Ex. 1. Volles Werk.

It is certainly pretty bad, but most of us have heard things very little better in England, even of late years. We have organists not a few who can as effectually 'speed the parting guest' as did their Italian brother. Good easy man, he may have been in his very best form that day. He may even have been congratulated afterwards by admiring friends. One can see him receiving their praises with a deprecatory air, 'So glad you liked it; yes, a little thing of my own,' not guessing that he was to receive a quite unexpected immortality, not as an artist, but as an awful example.

After all, he was merely subscribing to the popular idea that a postlude must needs be loud, quick, and cheerful. This, with certain other conventions of our profession, needs reconsidering. While a very quiet work is not often desirable, there is much to be said for, on occasion, a mf diapason movement, or a piece beginning rather loudly and ending (when most of the noise of footsteps is over) quietly. The out-voluntary is so closely joined to the service that it can hardly be considered entirely on its own merits. It is too commonly the practice to play pieces which, while excellent as music and first-rate for recital purposes, are quite out of place at the close of a service, unless something of a more restrained character be played first, to act as a kind of buffer. Pieces of very bright or dance-like rhythm (as most marches, Guilmant's 'Grand chœur alla Handel,' and all other pieces in minuet form) should not be thrown at the congregation until they have had time to forget their religious exercises and to resume some of their social duties. This is not a long or difficult business. One minute from the time the clergy have disappeared into the vestry will be sufficient. But it is not seemly for the organist to deliver himself of fanfares and the like while the faithful are still on their knees. Another convention is that Bach's fugues are, ipso facto, good postludes. This is true of only some of them. The giving out, with Great to Principal, of such bright, rhythmical subjects as those of the two G minor Fugues, the great A minor, the D major, or the C major (following the Toccata), always seems an impertinence, and even a flippancy. The very tunefulness of the subjects is the trouble. They seem to strike a jarring note unless introduced by a prelude. Fugues that are ideal as voluntaries, from the manner of their beginning, are both of those in B minor, the little E minor, A major F minor, the two in C major, the E $\flat$, and, most of all, the noble, melancholy work following the so-called 'Dorian Toccata.' Other works good for the purpose when something austere is in keeping are both Fantasias in C minor, the Canzona, the Prelude in F minor, and the Alla breve, and when something bigger is required, the E minor Prelude to the 'Wedge' Fugue, the Toccata in F, and the Preludes in B minor and C minor. The organ works of Bach (apart from the choral preludes) surely divide themselves into two classes. In one the value is purely musical, while in the other (usually not less valuable as artwork) the composer has obviously laid himself out to give players an opportunity of showing their skill. Such works as the D major Fugue, the D minor Toccata, the 'Wedge' Fugue, the G major Fantasia, and the E $\flat$ Prelude are surely recital pieces. If played as brilliantly as their contents seem to demand, they are out of place as voluntaries. It is not easy to follow the reasoning of those who tell us that such works should not be played at more than a moderate pace. Certainly in some buildings, and on some organs, a high rate of speed ruins the effect by muddling the polyphony, and organists should consider more than they do the acoustical conditions under which they play. But to say that these works should not be played fast because Bach could hardly have done so (owing to the heavy organ touch of his day) is surely absurd. Who can doubt that if the old man were alive now and giving recitals amongst us, he would revel in our best organs, and would give such a performance of his more showy pieces as would leave his hearers hot and breathless? Let us reserve them for recital purposes, and make them as brilliant and exciting as possible. On the other hand, let us see to it that we give our congregations ample opportunities of knowing the other—and deeper—side of Bach, by fitting and frequent performance of his more serious fugues and choral preludes.

Voluntaries may often be chosen with reference to the service which they precede or follow. But in practice this material point is often overlooked. It should go without saying that it is an excellent way of popularising good organ music. There are surely not many organists who let the Sunday after Ascension Day go by without playing Guilman's march on 'Lift up your heads,'—one of the best of voluntaries.

There are many other pieces that might easily become (if they are not already) every whit as hardy annuals. Thus, in Advent, you will find an encouraging number of people enjoying Bach's Prelude on 'Sleepers, wake!'—surely one of his most beautiful works. For Christmas, we have Guilman's 'Offertoire sur deux Noël's,' and, even better, though not nearly so well known as it deserves to be, Gigout's 'Rhapsody,' (published in the set of Ten Pieces), with a treatment of 'Adeste Fideles' far superior to that of Guilman.

The tune 'Von himmel hoch' (A. & M. 57, E. H. 17) is now so well known in England in connection with the season of Christmas that some of the excellent organ music written round it by various German composers might quite well be added to our list. Also the two short preludes by Bach on 'In dulci jubilo' are useful items, the canonic one being particularly charming, while an elaborate work on this same tune by Karg-Elert, recently published by Novello, is worth the attention of good players with ample organs. For Epiphanytide, there is of course the well-known 'Marche des Rois mages,' of Dubois—the playing which is usually followed by anxious inquiries as to the cipher on the organ! For Passiontide, in addition to such obvious choices as Bach's, Reger's, and Karg-Elert's preludes on 'O sacred Head' and similarly appropriate tunes, a fine Fantasia by Dr. Pearce on 'The royal banners' and 'All glory, laud and honour' (Vincent), will be a good choice for Palm Sunday. Also, for this day, Bach's Fantasia in B $\flat$ on the latter tune will be a popular voluntary. Of the two works with this melody as a basis, that in B $\flat$ is to be preferred, because the tune is easily followed by the average listener. At Easter we can play Dubois's 'Alleluia,' introducing 'O filii et filiae,' or John E. West's Variations on the same theme. Here again, Dr. Pearce comes in with a postlude founded on 'Ad cœnam agni providi,' while for dedication festivals at which the plainsong tune 'Urbs Beata' has been sung, I know nothing better than the same composer's piece founded on it—scholarly, interesting to the player, and easily followed by the hearer. For ordinary Festival use there are, of course, plenty of well-known works treating 'Ein' feste Burg' and 'Nun Danket.'

For the Feast of Corpus Christi there is an excellent piece by Dubois called 'La Fête Dieu' on the plainsong tune, 'Lauda Sion' (the punning dedication is surely unique—it is inscribed to the Abbe Panis, and the opening phrase is 'Ecce panis'). For this feast also a voluntary that will always strike a responsive chord is an arrangement of 'He shall feed His flock.' While the day of Handel's choruses as voluntaries is over, there are a few airs such as this that nobody but the ultra-purist need be ashamed of playing. They are better sung, of course, but they are better played than left alone if they help out the spirit of the day.

For any occasion of national significance, Reger's splendid Fantasia on 'God save the King' is excellent. It is not very difficult—for Reger, that is—and deserves to be much better known than it seems to be.

While mention of organ music founded on hymn-tunes naturally calls to mind certain German composers, ancient and modern, it is matter for congratulation that some fine English works with a similar basis have lately seen the light, thus adding materially to our store of voluntary music suitable for use on special occasions. The sets by Sir Hubert Parry (Novello) and Dr. Charles Wood (Stainer & Bell) stand out as being specially notable collections; while within the last few months other worthy additions to the list have come from Dr. Ethel Smyth (Novello), Dr. Charlton Palmer (Vincent), and Dr. C. H. Kitson (Stainer & Bell). Thus, with the use of such works and a little forethought, it is possible to make a very large proportion of our organ voluntaries appropriate pendants to the service. The last hymn, especially, will often give the cue. A piece based on a tune still fresh in people's minds will make an impression impossible at any other time.

The essence of success in such voluntaries is the familiarity of the subject-matter, and the ease with which it is identified. This applies to works other than those based on hymn-tunes. For example, if on the Feast of the Annunciation I play an arrangement of Arcadelt's 'Ave Maria,' I make a successful choice, because the music is not only beautiful (even when played instead of sung) but also familiar to most of those who hear it. They will enjoy it as abstract music, with the added pleasure that one derives from an apt quotation. But if I play either of Max Reger's two organ pieces entitled 'Ave Maria' I edify nobody. It is not merely a question of musical value, though in this instance there will be few of us who will not prefer the old Fleming to the young German. It is a matter of association of ideas. We may affect superior scorn of such things, but surely if by taking a little thought we can interest our congregations in good organ music, we should do so. Even on the most sordid of grounds it is good policy. The greater the public interest in organ playing the better for the organist.

Congregations are quicker than most of us imagine in detecting allusiveness. Sometimes they can even evolve it themselves with ludicrous results, as in a case that recently came under my notice. The organist played a piece in which extensive use was made of a phrase strongly reminiscent of the once-popular chorus 'Get your hair cut'! Any chance of the similarity escaping notice was knocked on the head by the fact of the services that day being conducted by a visitor with flowing locks. The organist has ever since been credited with the possession of a pretty wit, albeit of not too seemly a kind. Another choice that raised a smile was that of an organist who, at the end of a service of thanksgiving for the cessation of a devastating cattle plague, turned on an arrangement of 'Blest are the departed.' However, these be trifles. They are mentioned to show that congregations contain a fair percentage of acute listeners, and this being so, it may be well worth our while to take advantage of the fact.

Reverting for a moment to Bach, it is surely time that we organists gave up the idea that we should make a special point of playing his fugues in Advent and Lent. Much the same idea prevails, by the by, as to the occasional use of plainsong. In churches where plainsong is used at intervals it will be found served up only at these seasons. The association of plainsong and penitence is responsible for much of the unpopularity of the Church's old music. People do not like penitence, and they are not likely to be overfond of any of its accompaniments. As to the use of Bach's organ music at such times, organists have presumably reasoned on this wise: 'Bach is a composer of severe music, Lent and Advent are times when severity is in keeping, therefore Bach's music is suitable for Lent and Advent'—a statement of the case that appears to be logically sound, and would be so if the first of the premises read 'Bach composed nothing but severe music.' That was the old idea of Bach. We know him now, not only as a composer who plumbs the very depths of emotion, but also as a writer of most delightful dance music. So when an organist says 'Lent is on us, therefore I will play nothing but Bach,' and at the end of services in which the dominant note has been solemnity, breaks forth gaily into:

we may well ask, 'If this is severity, what, in heaven's name, is gaiety?'

The Bach for such seasons is found in:

and in dozens of similar movements. We may say, paraphrasing a well-known question—'What do they know of Bach, who only his fugues do know?'

Finally, when we have satisfied all requirements as to the appropriateness of a voluntary for the occasion, there remains the question, 'Is it good music?' There is such a wealth of fine organ works available, that the playing of pieces of low musical value is inexcusable. We have so often been told that there is little high-class organ music because Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, and other giants wrote none, that many of us have almost come to believe it. In this, as in too many other matters, organists have been content to take the line of least resistance. It is a much easier and more popular proceeding to play light pieces and transcriptions of well-known pianoforte, operatic, and orchestral works, than resolutely to insist on the fact that the organ has now a splendid library of its own. From the nature of things, its best music is of a type that appeals rather less quickly than that of some other media. The more necessary is it for those who are jealous of its honour to persevere, despite the grumblings of our less-educated hearers. We have in the past considered the majority too much. The enthusiastic audiences at the Promenade and similar orchestral concerts are not very discriminating, but they do undoubtedly appreciate music of the highest class. Similarly, thanks to the courage of competition Festival committees, we find choral societies of to-day singing and enjoying works of a kind that until recently they would have left severely alone. These are the people to whom we organists play week by week. Have we any right to suppose that they cannot appreciate organ music of as good a standard as the orchestral and choral works which they clearly enjoy? They are ready, though perhaps not clamouring, for bread. Too many of us are giving them the veriest slush. For our credit's sake—for a man is not more surely known by the company he keeps, than is an organist by the music he plays—we must improve. Besides, like our Italian friend whose handiwork is quoted above, we may some day entertain a Mendelssohn unawares.

Mr. C. H. Moody has been holding forth on the subject of the Anthem. We agree with him when he says that there are many unworthy specimens, and that more care is needed in selection. Mr. Moody must not complain, however, if we fail to follow him in some of his historical and other conclusions. For example, when he says that 'the Commonwealth caused a calamitous interruption in the magnificent advance of our church music,' he is expressing a popular opinion rather than a historical fact. The decline was already well on its way, for the very good reason that the supply of great composers had for the time ceased. As Parry points out in his 'Summary of musical history,' the last great representative of the choral epoch in Europe died in the very week Charles married Henrietta Maria. Again, so far from 'the degrading influences of Charles II.'s innovations' being 'fortunately counteracted by the efforts of Pelham Humfrey to bring the anthem of that period into line with the old traditions,' that talented youth was sent to France in order to learn a style more to the taste of the Merry Monarch than 'the old traditions.' Mr. Moody objects to the 'extreme modern productions of composers who are departing from the best English traditions, and following in the wake of Wagner and Debussy.' The lecturer, however, is so enthusiastic in his praise of the 'religious atmosphere' of 'Parsifal,' and so convinced as to its fitness for cathedral performance, that one fails to see how following in the wake of its composer can lead to anything but good results. As a matter of fact, however, we do not agree that English anthem writers of the present day are doing anything of the sort. A man may make use of modern harmonic resources without necessarily being an imitator of Wagner. Even so, one may venture to toy with the whole-tone scale without thereby declaring himself a Debussyste. If not, there were Debussytes long before that composer was born. The anthem showing his influence, however, has yet to come our way. 'Until composers are imbued with the spirit of worship, there will always be something lacking in their compositions,' says Mr. Moody, and we agree, feeling that we are now able to account for the 'religious atmosphere' in the 'Parsifal' of the pious, devoté Wagner. 'Clergy and amateur organists should be wary of accepting an anthem merely because it appeared in a respectable musical journal.' Anthems appear in musical journals merely as specimens, like unto the sample of tea or soap left by the grocer on the householder. As well may one say, 'housekeepers should be wary of purchasing goods merely because of the sample left by a respectable grocer.' We give householders, clergy, and organists alike credit for being able to judge from the sample whether the goods are the kind they need. The free provision of such samples does away with the necessity for 'buying a pig in a poke,' and the more 'respectable' the source, the less the risk of inferior goods. Considerable discussion, we learn, followed the reading of the paper. This is as it should be.

Recently Mr. Alfred Heath gave his two-hundredth organ recital at Cromer Parish Church.

HOLY TRINITY CHURCH, COVENTRY.

Holy Trinity Church is well known to all true lovers of architecture; of lovely proportions and chaste detail, the building is indeed one of rare beauty. Its musical history, too, is one of more than ordinary interest, and a few lines concerning it may be acceptable. Mention should first be made, however, of a few points worthy to be noticed by the traveller amongst these ancient piles. The stone pulpit and the eagle lectern, the two chief glories of the church, should on no account be overlooked. The one unique, and the other the earliest of its kind, deserve the closest attention. The reredos and the magnificent brass-work of the famous craftsman Skidmore should also be given more than passing notice.

Turning to the strictly musical side of our subject, we shall in the clergy vestry find an oil painting of the famous Dean Hook, who was vicar here 1828-37. He will be remembered as doing much for the cause of church music at Leeds, and was the incumbent there when the great Dr. Wesley was organist.

The organ—a fine four-manual instrument, stands in a chamber specially constructed for it in the south aisle of the choir. The console is behind and a little to the eastward of the Decani choir stalls.

The present organ is by Foster & Andrews (of Hull), and superseded one built by the famous Swarbrick. Its cost was about £800. This instrument was rebuilt by J. Porritt (of Leicester) in 1871. At the re-opening services the anthems 'Hallelujah' (Beethoven) and 'O praise God' (Clarke-Whitfield) were sung. The morning service also included a Sanctus by Mendelssohn. The last restoration took place in 1900, and was carried out by Messrs. Hill & Son. The solo organ was then added, and the console moved to its present position. For the opening service C. H. Moody, the then organist, wrote a special evening service, and Dr. Tertius Noble (late of York Minster) also contributed a Festival Te Deum.

In treating of the chief musicians of the church, Chater should be mentioned as holding office at the first renovation of the organ. His musical legacy, further than a few chants, does not seem to be of importance. Mr. Hanson, Chater's successor, is the father of a well-known musical family still resident at Coventry.

Mr. C. H. Moody, the present organist of Ripon Cathedral, is next on the roll. Coming from Wells Cathedral, where he had been acting-organist and master of the chorists, Moody was, although quite a young man, a fine musician, and during his reign the choir reached a high pitch of excellence. He was organist during the second restoration of the organ (in 1900), and wrote an evening service in A for that occasion. He introduced to Coventry much high-class music, including Bach's 'Sleepers, wake,' Brahms's 'Requiem,' and other works of similar calibre. His Ripon appointment came in 1902.

The next holder of the post was Mr. Percy E. Hughes, Mus. Bac. He came to Trinity with good recommendations, which were speedily justified. He was a sound musician, both executive and theoretical. His contributions to church music include a Communion Service in E and an Evening Service in D; both of these are published by Messrs. Novello. During the latter part of his Coventry period Mr. Hughes took Holy Orders, and early in 1912 he left for Rochester on his appointment to a minor canonry at the Cathedral there. His recent appointment to the Precentorship of that Cathedral has given great pleasure to his numerous Coventry friends.

The present holder of the office is Dr. Christie Green, F.R.C.O. Coming of good musical stock, Dr. Green has held organ appointments since the early age of eleven. He was for some time assistant to Dr. Creser at Leeds Parish Church. From thence he was appointed to Blackburn Parish Church, which post he had held since 1900. A Yorkshireman by birth, he is naturally an ideal choirmaster, and in his short period of office he has sustained the standard fixed by his predecessors. He has written much church music, as well as songs, &c. Among his published works should be mentioned his anthem for Harvest, 'O sing to the Lord'—containing a fine tenor solo and a vigorous fugue. As an executant Dr. Green is of the quiet 'Cathedral' order. His expressed belief is that the organ is only to accompany the voices during divine service, and not to fill the part of a solo instrument as so often is the case. During the year Dr. Green gives monthly organ recitals which are much appreciated.

The present choir consists of some twenty-two to twenty-four boys and eighteen lay clerks. The boys have daily practice (except Saturday), and the full choir meet for rehearsal on Friday evenings.

The repertoire consists of the best products of the 'Cathedral' school mingled with a judicious blending of the better class of modern church music. 'ADAGIO.'

A choral Festival was held in the Parish Church, Tamworth, on July 23, when about 170 voices took part. The music included Stanford in B flat and Beethoven's 'Hallelujah to the Father.' A hymn-tune to the words 'Blessed city' was written for the occasion by Mr. J. B. Lott, organist of Lichfield Cathedral, who conducted at the Festival. Mr. H. Rose was the organist.

A musical service was held at the Forest Road Primitive Methodist Church, Nottingham, on September 7, when solos were given by Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. H. Smith, and Mr. W. Downing. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson was the accompanist, and contributed solos, including Hollins's Concert Overture in C.

A special feature of the organ that is being erected in the large hall of the Bishopsgate Institute is the Carillon stop, supplied by the Church and Carillon Bell Company. The bells are worked from the console by an electric action invented by Dr. T. Lea Southgate. The organ is being built by Messrs. Bradbury & Foster, Sheffield, at a cost of £2,300.

The Annual United Festival of the Queen Victoria Clergy Fund and Clergy Pensions Institution (Southwark Diocesan Branches) will take place in Southwark Cathedral on Wednesday evening, October 15, at 7.30 p.m. The 'Grail' music from 'Parsifal' will be performed by the Cathedral choir, under the direction of Mr. Edgar T. Cook, the organist of the Cathedral, and the preacher will be the Bishop of Stepney. The greater portion of the Cathedral will be open to the public without tickets. The nave will be reserved for subscribers and ticket-holders. Applications for these tickets, which are limited in number, should be made to the Diocesan Secretary of the Funds, Mr. Richard Lemaire, 'Kilgraston,' Purley, and not to the Cathedral authorities.

Reviews.

Epilogue. By W. Wolstenholme. Original Compositions for the Organ. (New series, No. 20.)

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

English organ music is usually of such a suave—even apologetic—character, that this work gives one almost a shock. To those of us who demand in our organ music rather stronger meat than is usually served up by our native composers, the shock will be not unpleasant. A bold Adagio is followed by an Allegro, at the tenth bar of which a capital subject is fugally treated,—all too briefly, we venture to think. The composer gives us the exposition, and hard on its heels a very close Stretto, repeated a tone higher. This page is all the fugal-writing we get, and it is so good that one feels regret that there is so little of it. We could have spared for it some of the later matter which, excellent as it is, is somewhat disjoint. Altogether, good strong music, and from its startling opening bar:

to the daring succession of sevenths at its close:

containing many points of harmonic and rhythmic interest.

The Harmonious Blacksmith. Variations in E. By G. F. Handel. Paraphrased for organ by Sigfrid Karg-Elert.

Vom Himmel hoch ('Behold! I come from heaven above'). Kanzone for solo, chorus, solo-violin, and organ. By Sigfrid Karg-Elert.

Benedictus. For four solo voices, chorus, violin, harp (or pianoforte, ad lib.) and organ. By Sigfrid Karg-Elert.

[Carl Simon : Berlin.]

One is somewhat surprised to find our conscientious German friends retaining the popular title for Handel's work. Many English musicians are content to use its correct description, viz., 'Air with doubles (variations) from a Suite,' and to mention in a note the usual name and its apocryphal horny-handed origin. This by the way. Herr Karg-Elert's organ version of the Variations is decidedly free. There are purists not a few who will complain that he has done those things which he ought not to have done. For such as prefer old Handel's charming strains unimproved (or unspoiled—the point of view will decide the choice of term), this work will be an offence. To others, not so fastidious, and desiring a brilliant recital piece, it will be welcome.

Although opinions may vary as to the transcriber's work in the Handel Variations, there can be only one verdict as to his efforts as composer in the other numbers. The first makes use of the little prelude on 'Vom Himmel hoch,' found in the 'Choral improvisations' (vol. i.), by way of introduction, followed by the arrangement for violin solo, voice, and organ from the 'Twenty Preludes and Postludes,' Op. 78. The six pages which make up the rest of the work consist of very effective use of the choir with organ and violin. We have first a four-part version of the hymn (unaccompanied), with short organ interludes, and a discant for boys' voices, and then a clever canonic treatment of the tune, the altos and basses (representing the angels) leading off each line in D, followed four notes later by the sopranos and tenors (the people) in G, with a free organ part in four- and five-part harmony. A massive choral climax leads to a pianissimo ending. The 'Benedictus' gives both solo quartet and choir plenty of opportunities, the part-writing being very interesting and free, though not unduly difficult. There is an imposing climax at 'in Excelsis.' Both these pieces are well within the power of good average church choirs. It should not be difficult to provide the solo violin and pianoforte (for harp). Performed at an organ recital, carol service, or some similar musical occasion, these works would be most interesting novelties.

I will greatly rejoice. Full anthem for Harvest. By Edward C. Bairstow.

O Lord, I will praise Thee. By Hugh Blair.

New every morning is the love. By Bertram Luard-Selby.

Te Deum. In G minor. By Bertram Luard-Selby.

O Lord God of Hosts. By Dr. Maurice Green.

All Thy works praise Thee. By Thomas Adams.

Ye shall go out with joy. By Oliver King.

Lord, what is man? By Dr. William Boyce.

Jesu, our Lord. By Ch. Gounod.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Although Dr. Bairstow's anthem is designed for use at Harvest Festivals, the text that makes it suitable for such occasions ('For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth, so the Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all nations') does not unfit it for more general use. It is an excellent specimen of modern Church music, not the least interesting feature being its admirable organ part.

Dr. Blair's anthem (composed for the closing service of the recent Gloucester Festival) is also a virile piece of work, with the accompaniment again an important feature—though this must not be read as an implication that the voice parts lack interest. Very effective, for example, is the middle section for bass solo, and three-part treble and alto chorus.

B. Luard-Selby has written pleasing music to John Keble's well-known morning-hymn, and an effective setting of the Te Deum, both of a very moderate degree of difficulty. Also well within the powers of ordinary church choirs are the other anthems in the above list. The Gounod work, it may be well to point out, is that often sung to words commencing 'Send out Thy light.'

Funerale. By Sigfrid Karg-Elert.

Choral-Improvisation on 'In dulci Jubilo.' By Sigfrid Karg-Elert. Op. 75.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The first of these two works bears the dedication 'Dem Andenken Alex. Guilmants.' It is full of the striking harmonic and other effects that we now expect from the brilliant young German who has so quickly leapt into the front rank of composers for the organ. There is perhaps some ground for the fear that certain of his characteristic progressions threaten to become mannerisms. For example, his sudden upward-rushing scale-passages belong to the class of effect whose exciting power is in inverse ratio to the frequency of their occurrence. There are seven such passages in the 'Funerale,' which most of us will opine to be five too many. Also, one feels that his strings of consecutive fifths are not always justified by any special effect of sonority. We have a tolerant eye for consecutives in these enlightened days, but after all they are not good part-writing, and being thus departures from the normal, they should be able to justify their existence by adding something of value to the tout ensemble. Too often they look merely eccentric or defiant, as who should say, 'our composer is a devil of a fellow, who doesn't care that for rules.' The 'Funerale' contains a couple of quotations from Guilmants' works, and is a highly-coloured composition needing a good player and an ample organ to make its full effect. The work on 'In dulci Jubilo,' besides being of more general interest in its subject, is also more attractive in style. Full of charm is the opening statement of the tune, with its swinging bell-like accompaniment, while the composer has surely written nothing more graceful than the canonic treatment of a decorated version of the theme which follows. Here are the opening bars:

A couple of pages of matter more or less dealing with fragments of the subject lead to the final section (alla Toccata), which is in the composer's most strenuously brilliant style. As a recital piece this work should make a decided effect. It is rather difficult, but will well repay study.

Voluntary; Impromptu; Legend. Original Compositions for the Organ. (New Series, Nos. 23, 24, and 25.) By W. G. Alcock.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The old title exactly suits the first of these pieces, an unpretentious little work, and just the kind of thing to play before a service. The Impromptu is almost as simple, and should be similarly useful. The Legend is rather more elaborate, and would make an acceptable recital piece. There is some charming writing in the opening and closing pages, with a melody played on a 4-ft. Choir stop coupled to Pedal (no pedal stops), while a short middle section of more vigorous character provides contrast. All three pieces have the pedal part carefully 'footed,' and would serve well for teaching purposes. The third is the most difficult, though only moderately so.

Album of Pianoforte Pieces. By Cyril Scott.

[Elkin & Co.]

The copious river of music that proceeds from Mr. Cyril Scott's brain and technique is worth watching, for its flow is seldom dull or uneventful, and matter of vital interest is often carried with the stream. It is not his practice, it appears, to let composition wait upon inspiration, but to compose and hope for inspiration to come in the process. The hope is realised for several moments in the course of the pieces under review, but not with regularity, and there are passages in them whose sole function is to bear the signature of Cyril Scott. Such music forms the bulk of this Album. However, there are ideas that engage the attention, and among them are the theme of the 'Berceuse,' the 'atmospheric' effects in 'Over the prairie,' and some rhythms and harmonies in 'Pierette.' The Album contains six pieces of medium difficulty.

Cavatina. Joachim Raff. Arranged by John E. West.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Raff's ever-green and widely-known work (does it not share pride of place with a certain Prelude in C minor in all the picture theatres?) makes its bow here as a very acceptable organ solo.

From 'Crescendo' in the Star we learn some interesting particulars regarding Strauss's new orchestral work, which is to be performed under Herr Mengelberg at a concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society. It has been written for the opening of the new concert hall of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna, on October 19, and is entitled 'Festliches Präludium.' The composer requires ninety-six stringed instruments, the usual wind and percussion, and twelve trumpets 'off.' The time of performance is ten minutes.

Correspondence.

GERMAN ORGANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Mr. C. Stanley Parsonson's interesting letter raises one or two questions which I am called upon to answer. I am not, however, in a position to give much more information concerning these German instruments, but hope (as a result of inquiries) that particulars may be forthcoming soon. My letter really aimed at creating further interest in an interesting subject (and no doubt, together with Mr. Parsonson's letter, it has done or will do so) in order that authoritative and detailed particulars may be had from those best able to supply it (viz., leading German organ-builders and organists).

The organ to which I referred (in the American Church, Berlin) was built, I believe, at least seven or eight years ago—so it would seem that German organ-builders were at least first in the field with the coupling accessory to which I particularly referred, which has doubtless been improved upon in German instruments built more recently. Also, it would appear from what Mr. Parsonson says, that in his organ a change of couplers with change of manual at least requires a piston to be touched, and while fully recognising that this is about as simple an operation as could be desired, I beg to point out (perhaps I did not make this point quite clear) that in the German instrument it is not (during performance) even necessary to touch a piston in order to change the couplers. A small 'push' is pressed in—the self-acting coupler arrangement is 'on'; it is pulled out—one dispenses with its services. In the case referred to (coupling Great to Pedal whilst still playing upon Swell) one would obviously dispense with the self-acting coupling device, and touch the tablet 'Great to Pedal.' It seems hardly necessary to say that the device does not act absolutely instantaneously; probably it takes from half a second to a second to come on or go off. I also believe that it is necessary to sound at least two notes together on a manual for the device to operate—so that the danger Mr. Parsonson fears in the case of solo playing does not really exist. In such an instance therefore as Wolstenholme's familiar Canzone in B flat, at the commencement, provided that the first chord of the accompaniment (on 'Choir') were not played too staccato, 'Choir would couple to 'Pedal,' and our friend 'Koppel' would continue to perform its functions satisfactorily throughout the piece—rests in the accompaniment (by staccato playing, or its cessation altogether for a while) notwithstanding. To ensure the first pedal note played being duplicated simultaneously and instantaneously in 3-ft. tone on the Choir, one would take the precautionary measure to see that the ordinary coupler 'Choir to Pedal' be set 'on.'

No; the device referred to affects the couplers merely—not the Pedal stops also. No doubt the system adopted in Mr. Parsonson's organ is about as perfect as could be desired. At the same time I believe that many German instruments are far in advance of the small one to which I referred, and in fact unite the advantages of the 'Pedal bass' piston with the perfectly spontaneous action of the German coupling device.

As to the matter of the downward extension of the manuals to form a Pedal organ, I will not presume to restate the case for or against (so soon after the recent controversy in your columns); we will admit—with Sir Roger—that 'much might be said on both sides.' Probably the best solution would be a fusion of the two principles—viz., the provision of an adequate number of Pedal stops as basses for the various tones of the manual registers, yet not depriving the more conservative English organist (venturing to believe that in this respect English instruments are the best in the world) at least of a 16-ft. wood Open Diapason of liberal scale and full Pedal compass. Of what manual stop or stops could this be considered an extension? Without hearing these large Continental instruments one can form little idea of the unsatisfactory nature of the Pedal organ (as compared with the English cathedral instruments)—on account, apparently, of economy of timber, and of course also of wind consumption, in that department, a huge number of registers appearing on the schedule nevertheless.

W. GODFREY SCEATS.

'CHARLES YOUNG AND FAMILY.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—May I point out a slip in Dr. Cummings's admirable article on the above. The statement is made that Miss Pollie Young was born in 1751, and this is repeated in the genealogical chart. Dr. Cummings says that Pollie Young 'was only four years old when her father died,' and 'she sang in a Pastoral Sketch at Drury Lane Theatre on October 22, 1762.'

The fact is that Pollie Young was born in 1748, or early in 1749, and she was brought to Ireland by her aunt, Mrs. Arne, at the end of September, 1755. She made her début in Arne's opera of 'Eliza' on Saturday, November 29, 1755, and is described as 'a Child of six years of Age.' It is well-known that in these cases the real age is seldom underestimated, and therefore it is likely that Miss Young was fully seven years old at this date. Again, on August 8, 1758, Mrs. Delaney describes her as 'a girl of nine years old,' and this evidently assumes that Miss Young was born before 1749. She sang continuously at Dublin from 1755 to 1762, and she was specially selected by Kane O'Hara for the initial performance of 'Midas' on January 22, 1762. She was given a benefit concert at Fishamble Street Music Hall on February 11, 1762, and she returned to London in April of the same year. Her London début was on October 15, 1762, at Covent Garden, in 'Comus.' Four years later, at the age of eighteen, she married Barthélemon at Dublin.—Yours faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

Sept. 8, 1913.

Dr. Cummings replies: 'I am much obliged to Dr. Grattan Flood for calling attention to the birthplace of Pollie Young. I had not noticed the discrepancies he mentions. I gave the dates as supplied to me by a descendant of Charles Young.'

PERFORMING FEES ON SONGS, ETC.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—There is a proposal on foot to form a Society having for its object the collection of performing fees on vocal and instrumental music.

Whilst admitting that in many cases there are legitimate performing rights on certain dramatic and musical works, we think it is only fair to draw the attention of the public to the fact that unless it was specifically stated on the title-page of musical works published up to July 1, 1912, that the performing rights were reserved, such works may be continued to be performed in public free of fee or license.

If such a Society is formed it is essential that concert-givers should demand a complete list of all works on which a performing fee is claimed, for this reason: Under the Copyright Act, 1912, it is no longer necessary to print on the title-page of a song, or any musical work, that the performing rights are reserved, therefore unless a comprehensive list of protected works is issued the public will be quite in the dark as to what is protected and what is free.—We are, Yours faithfully,

R.C.O. EXAMINATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—After a careful perusal of the various test-pieces to be played at the Examinations of the Royal College of Organists in January, 1914, I have found over eighty errors, a list of which I shall be pleased to forward to anyone on receipt of a stamped directed envelope.

HERBERT HODGE.

40, Ashmead Road,
St. John's, S.E.

Obituary.

Widespread regret has been caused by the death of Mr. ALFRED R. GAUL, Mus. Bac., the well-known composer, until recently the organist of St. Augustine's Church, Edgbaston. He died early in the morning of September 13, at the age of seventy-six. He came of a Norwich family that brought him early under the influence of music. When nine years old he became a chorister at Norwich Cathedral; at seventeen he was organist of Fakenham Parish Church. In 1859, at the age of twenty-two, he took up residence at Birmingham, where he became organist of St. John's, Ladywood. His appointment to St. Augustine's Church occurred in 1868. It was of course as a composer that he earned success and fame. His sacred work 'The Holy City,' produced at the Birmingham Triennial Festival of 1882, has had phenomenal popularity, and has probably been performed more frequently than any other British choral work. His chief works are 'Hezekiah' (written at the age of twenty-three), the well-known part-song 'The silent land,' 'Ruth' (1881), 'The Holy City,' 'Passion music,' the cantata 'Joan of Arc,' 'The Ten Virgins,' 'Israel in the wilderness,' the cantata 'Una' (Norwich Festival, 1893), Psalm 150, the cantatas 'The Prince of Peace' and 'Toilers of the deep,' and the choral ode 'A song of life.'

We regret to record also the following deaths:

MISS MARIE-TÉRÈSE (LILY) HOLCROFT JEAFFRESON, at her residence, Clarendon Avenue, Leamington Spa, on September 2, after an illness of some months' duration. She was the second daughter of the late Samuel John Jeaffreson, M.D., and was born at Leamington in 1848. Early in girlhood she developed a high soprano voice of exceptionally sweet and sympathetic quality. She was educated at Paris, and studied singing privately with Romain Bussine, the founder of the Société Nationale de Musique. Later on she entered the Royal Academy of Music with a view to adopting a professional career; but her voice was not powerful enough to tell in the larger concert halls, therefore in 1880 she settled in her native town, where she established a wide connection as a teacher of singing, visiting Warwick, Banbury, Birmingham, Leicester, Coventry, and other Midland centres. She was a remarkably good linguist, and maintained a high standard of musical culture at a time when provincial musical life was not so full of vitality as it is now. With advancing years she was forced to restrict the circle of her activities, but was ever ready to take part in every local enterprise for the advancement of her art. She was on the executive committee of the Leamington and County Musical Festival, and was warmly interested in the Competition Festival movement. Miss Holcroft Jeaffreson was an elder sister of Mrs. Rosa Newmarch.

Mr. THOMAS BERRY, Mus. Bac., Cantab., one of the best-known and most highly-respected organists at Glasgow, which took place with tragic suddenness on September 15. While still a youth, Mr. Berry crossed the Border from his native Yorkshire to fill the position of organist and choir-master of Inveresk Parish Church, and on the retirement of Dr. A. L. Peace from Trinity Church, Glasgow, in 1873, Mr. Berry was chosen as his successor. Twenty-six years ago he was appointed to Belhaven Church, one of the most influential congregations in the West-end of the city, and there he officiated up to almost twenty-four hours before his death. Shortly after coming to Glasgow he was appointed organist and accompanist to the Choral Union, a position he held until a few years ago. Mr. Berry was not only a very able organist, but also a keen student of English and German literature, and a man of great general culture. He was one of the most modest of men, kindly, genial, and warm-hearted, and his death at the age of sixty-three is sincerely mourned by a large circle of friends.

MICHAEL MAYBRICK, known to the public as Stephen Adams. He was one of the most successful song writers of his day, and 'Thora,' 'The Holy City,' 'Nirvana,' 'The Midshipmite,' and 'Nancy Lee,' are still known far and wide. His popularity was earned by a gift for facile and intelligible melody. He was born at Liverpool in 1844, became a pupil of W. T. Best, and when fourteen years of age was appointed organist of St. Peter's Church. In 1866 he entered the Leipsic Conservatorium, where his studies included singing, and from 1869 for about fifteen years he was before the public as a baritone. His first successful song was 'Nancy Lee' (published in 1896), of which seventy thousand copies were sold in eighteen months.

Captain ALEXANDER SPINK BEAUMONT, at Beckenham, on September 4. He was a son of General Beaumont, of the 92nd Highlanders, and was born at Manchester in 1843. He entered the Army and became Captain of the 23rd Regiment (Royal Welsh Fusiliers). He was a clever amateur musician—who will be remembered with gratitude by many young students for his generous and timely help. Amongst the most notable of those he assisted was the late Mr. W. Y. Hurlstone. Captain Beaumont's services to music were recognised when he was presented with the Freedom of the City of London in September, 1910.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

London Symphony Orchestra.—Twelve concerts are announced to take place on Monday evenings. The dates and conductors are as follows:—October 27, November 10 and 24, December 8 (Herr Fritz Steinbach); January 26 (M. Emil Mlynarski); February 9 (Herr Fritz Steinbach); March 30 (M. Wassili Safonoff); May 11 and 25 (Herr Mengelberg); June 8, 15 and 22 (Herr Arthur Nikisch).

Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts.—These concerts will be given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood, on the afternoons of October 18, November 1, 15, and 29; January 17 and 31; February 14 and 28. (Further reference to these series will be found on p. 651.)

Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts continue, with the above-mentioned orchestra and conductor, on week-day evenings until October 25.

New Symphony Orchestra (Mr. Landon Ronald).—Particulars of the season's work are not yet announced, except that on November 3 (evening) the orchestra will give the first London performance of Elgar's new work 'Falstaff,' and will play his second Symphony.

Queen's Hall Sunday Afternoon Concerts.—These will be given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood, on Sundays, from October 5 to December 28. Arrangements for the latter half of the season have yet to be announced.

THE BRITISH MUSIC EXHIBITION.

OLYMPIA, SEPTEMBER 6-20.

This was a most commendable enterprise, and it was managed with great spirit. The chief motive of the Exhibition was apparently to prove that British manufacturers of pianofortes and piano-players can hold their own against the foreigner, and as to this it may be said that in the medium-priced instruments at least the home-made article made a brave and convincing show. It was gratifying to hear that the pianoforte trade generally was improving, and no doubt it will be one of the natural results of this Exhibition to still further advance its interests.

The Exhibition was opened by the Lord Mayor, attended by the Sheriffs, on Saturday, September 6. This civic recognition was a good augury. At the sumptuous luncheon that was one of the most agreeable features of the opening function, his lordship spoke eloquently of the part English firms had played in the past in the construction of musical instruments, and he denounced the unpatriotic fashion that obtained amongst certain classes of the community of buying foreign instruments. He declared that he believed that this fetish was about to receive its death-blow, and that the idea that foreign pianofortes were better than English would soon be dissipated. Mr. John Wood, the energetic president of the Pianoforte Manufacturers' Association, spoke in the same strain. The preface of the catalogue stated that the promoters of the Exhibition were satisfied that it would be the means of considerably enlightening the public regarding the vast extent of British pianoforte and music industry, and would undoubtedly lead to an extended appreciation of British goods.

Sixty-three firms exhibited. They included all the best-known firms, such as Broadwood & Sons, Chappell & Co., John Brinsmead & Sons, Challen & Son, J. B. Cramer & Co., J. & J. Hopkinson, Sir Herbert Marshall & Sons, Moore & Moore, Murdoch & Co., George Rogers & Sons. Piano-players were strikingly in evidence, and bore witness to the great ingenuity of contrivance that is now brought to the service of this increasingly popular device to save trouble and yield pleasure. Messrs. John Malcolm & Co. presented one of the most absorbingly interesting shows in the Exhibition. This consisted of a practical demonstration of the various operations that go to make a pneumatic player. Machinery was shown in operation, and there were representatives of practically every department of a 'player' factory. Messrs. Brinsmead similarly showed the building of a pianoforte. Many visitors were attracted to the fine exhibition of old instruments contributed by Messrs. Broadwood & Sons. Here were a clavichord in gold lacquered case, a spinet by Hitchcock, of London, a harpsichord by Burkart Schudi, and another bearing the names of Schudi and Johannes Broadwood, a pianoforte by Zumpe, made in 1766, a square pianoforte by Johannes Broadwood, made in 1774, and others of later date, leading up to the Broadwood grand. Challen & Son, amongst other excellent instruments, exhibited a 72-octave baby grand of beautiful design, clear touch, and charming tone-quality. Chappell & Co. showed first-rate instruments of all varieties, some of their specialities being small grands of 7½ octaves. The Pathé Frères Pathéphone Company had a splendid display of their latest instruments and records, and the Columbia Gramophone Company also exhibited many fine instruments. Messrs. Hawkes & Son showed orchestral and military band instruments, including some foreign-made violins.

One of the insuperable difficulties of a show of this description was that there could be no proper testing of the instruments, owing to the fact that gramophones, piano-players, and ordinary pianofortes were all going simultaneously. Daily concerts were an attractive feature of the scheme, but these were given in another apartment. A series of musical competitions was also organized, and drew a great number of solo entries. This department we report in the Competition Festival Record.

The executive committee—of which, as already stated, Mr. John Wood (of J. B. Cramer & Co.) was the chairman—was a strong one. The vice-chairman was Mr. Henry Billinghurst (of Brinsmead's), and the hon. secretary was Mr. James Hillier. The Exhibition was under the patronage of H.R.H. The Duke of Connaught, and there was a host of vice-presidents. The Worshipful Company of Musicians, the Royal Academy, the Royal College, Guildhall School, Trinity College, and the Society of British Composers, swelled the imposing list of patrons.

HOME MUSIC STUDY UNION.

The tiny village of Portballintrae was this year, for the third time, the centre for the Annual Musicians' Holiday of the Home Music Study Union. The attendance was not so large as last year, but having regard to the lateness of the season and the distance of the place from many great centres it was very satisfactory. The same excellent spirit as in former years prevailed, and a party of some sixty musicians of many grades and positions lived a happy family life together from August 30 to September 13. No fixed course of lectures had been laid down, but folk-song and folk-dancing formed the chief subjects. Miss Mary Neal lectured on 'The history and revival of English folk-dance,' and Miss Blanche Payling demonstrated the practical side of the subject by teaching a number of dances to the members of the party. Unfortunately, Mrs. C. Milligan Fox, who was to have lectured on 'The songs of Waterford,' was unable to attend owing to a nervous breakdown. The proposed Irish plays had also to be abandoned owing to her absence, and that of Miss Dorothy Clarendon, who was unable to attend owing to a recent family bereavement.

Monsieur M.-D. Calvocoressi added a new element to this study by his lecture on 'Folk-songs of Greece,' and a cognate subject was that of the songs and stories of the negroes in the Southern States of America. Examples of many of these were given by Miss Grace Cleveland Porter, who hails from that country. Dr. E. C. Bairstow, whose popularity with members of the Union is very great, lectured on 'Common-sense in voice-production.' He also conducted a number of choral rehearsals, several of which were held on the seashore and other outdoor places, and directed the performance of a number of part-songs at a concert given at Bushmills.

The 'art' side of music was dealt with very fully by Monsieur Calvocoressi in a series of lectures on 'The musical geography of Europe,' and in many discussions on that and other related subjects. Other matters were a discussion on 'Childhood and Music,' opened by David Penrith, and lectures by Mr. Percy A. Scholes on 'A glimpse at Purcell's London,' by Dr. E. J. Bellerby on 'The music of the Finns,' and by Mr. Thomas Henderson on 'Irish Fairy-tales.' Mr. William A. Trail, one of the leading residents in the neighbourhood, gave a most luminous description of 'The Geology of County Antrim,' which afforded happy relief from 'shop' and was highly appreciated.

The services of Mr. and Mrs. Scholes as host and hostess, and of Mr. J. W. Garbutt and Miss Ainsworth, who acted as guides and catered for the physical needs of the party inside and outside the house, also received high meed of praise.

'DANCING SCENERY' AT BOURNEMOUTH: MR. RUTLAND BOUGHTON'S EXPERIMENT.

It cannot be gainsaid that this is an age of novelty and flux, and nowhere is this more plainly discernible than in the realms of art. New art-forms are being evolved with tolerable frequency. Some, like the theories of the Impressionists and Post-Impressionists, flash into view after the manner of a new comet, and as speedily sink below the horizon again. The Post-Impressionist painters give way to the Cubists; in literature, the purely sentimental writers who once set the standard are displaced by the modern interpreter of psychological problems.

In music, too, this movement and constant displacement are absorbing the thought and attention of active minds, although to the casual observer the changes may be almost imperceptible and of no immediate consequence. Sometimes, however, current theories experience such a bolt from the blue that, apart from the chance of any volte-face being effected, to delude ourselves with the belief that nothing whatever is occasioning us disturbance would be a proof of absurd self-confidence. At the Bournemouth Winter Gardens (on August 27 and 28), for instance, the experiment conducted by Mr. Rutland Boughton was of more than ordinary significance. For some time past rumour has been busy with Mr. Reginald Buckley's and Mr. Boughton's choral drama, 'The Birth of Arthur,' but the work has suffered many vicissitudes, and it was not until Bournemouth furnished the opportunity that any progress could be made with its presentation. Even as it was the production was limited to the whole of the Prelude and First Scene, but nevertheless sufficient was heard and seen to allow of a fair estimate of its characteristics.

Mr. Boughton's innovation is an extreme one, and consists in the substitution of persons for stage accessories and scenery—or, in the words of the producer, human staging: that is to say, the provision of the necessary atmosphere and environment is not entrusted to stage 'hands,' but everything is suggested by means of the gestures and rhythmic movements of a body of dancers and singers. Mr. Boughton has definitely stated that his aims are other than realistic; and indeed the principles of realism could not with success be applied to such a scheme. No; the methods are those of Symbolism, and our whole critical attitude must be consonant with that standpoint. Symbolism, accordingly, being purely an appeal to the imagination, the success of the venture hinged upon the question whether the imagination was assisted, or the reverse, by the process. And here we run up against a very formidable obstacle to the forming of an exact assessment, namely, the personal factor: for it may easily be seen that to the eminently practical and platitudinous person the idiom may have revealed new worlds and opened up fresh vistas. On the other hand, those whose senses are independent of such subtle aids may have found the harmony of their illusions set awry and almost distorted by ideas that conflicted with their immediate imaginings. We will therefore leave it at that, the case being such that no general criticism could afford to neglect the personal equation.

Turning to the performance and dismissing the principles involved, one can unreservedly praise the charming and illuminative manner in which the excerpt was presented—so far, at any rate, as the evening performance was concerned. The performers, though few in number, seemed imbued with a full consciousness of their responsibilities, and carried out their duties enthusiastically and well. The soloists, Mrs. Tobias Matthey and Mr. Arthur Jordan, were very successful; particularly praiseworthy was Mrs. Matthey's performance, seeing that it was somewhat out of her accustomed line. Mr. Boughton's dramatic and very feeling music was effectively interpreted by the Municipal Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Edgar L. Bainton. The latter's position was no insecure, and he is deserving of special commendation for his ever ready tact and judgment. The proceedings were diversified by some dances by Miss Margaret Morris, wherein the dancer proved that a high level of excellence in this art is not the sole prerogative of the Russian school.

Finally, we would express the hope that 'The Birth of Arthur' will now obtain a production in its complete form and on a festival scale, for even though it fail to be the herald of a new art-form, it is a work containing many unique features and a goodly amount of poetic charm.

THE GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The Three Choirs Festival, held at Gloucester, September 7-12, has again justified its existence and confounded the vaticinations of pessimists. The number of subscribers and stewards was the largest on record, and the total number of tickets sold was 14,205 as against 13,270 three years ago, when the Festival was last held at Gloucester. The sale of serial tickets was 382, as against 350 in 1910. It is announced that in round figures £1,750 would be handed over to the treasurer of the Charity Fund. This is the largest sum realised since 1877.

The programme was an eclectic one, representing all schools. Necessarily it was constructed with a view to the tastes and desires of the supporters of the Three Choirs Festival. Some want only what they already know, and others are curious as to the developments of modern music. It may be said that Gloucester gave everybody something they wanted.

The orchestra was splendidly equipped in every department, and consisted mainly of members of the London Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Reed.

The Festival choir was made up as follows: Sopranos, 79, in addition to 14 boy chorists; contraltos, 52, in addition to 11 male altos; tenors, 58; and basses, 65: total, 279.

The popular personal features of the Festival were the appearance of Madame Aino Aekté, the celebrated Finnish singer, and Dr. Camille Saint-Saëns.

The Festival began with a great opening service in the Cathedral on Sunday afternoon, September 7. The following music was performed by full orchestra and festival choir:

A Festival Overture	C. H. Lloyd
Allegro Moderato ('Unfinished' Symphony)	Schubert
Psalm cxlv. (Chant in B flat)	G. R. Sinclair
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C	A. Herbert Brewer
Soloist, Miss Dorothy Silk.
Anthem 'O Lord, Thou art my God'	C. Lee Williams
Soloist, Miss Dorothy Silk.
Second Anthem 'Hallelujah' ('Engedi')	Beethoven
Hymn 'O God our Help in ages past'	W. Croft
(Arranged by C. H. Lloyd)
Coronation March (1911)	Edward Elgar
Concluding Voluntary—Phantasia for the Organ on the Choral 'Hallelujah! Gott zu loben, bleibe meine Seelenfreud'	Max Reger
Organist	Mr. A. P. Porter.

The sermon was preached by the Very Rev. The Dean of Gloucester, who took as his text Revelation xiv., verse 3. He referred to the arguments brought forward to support the holding of the performances in the Cathedral, and stated that he regarded the Festival as a crowning act of worship of all the services held in that sacred building. It was a fitting place for the presentation of the great oratorios.

'Elijah' was given on the 9th, and as usual drew a large audience. The principal soloists were Miss Ruth Vincent, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Dalton Baker. In the double-quadrets Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Alys Gear, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. H. Finch assisted. The performance was a very good one. The beautiful quality of Miss Vincent's voice and her somewhat plaintive style were interesting features. Mr. Baker, who, we regret to hear, is soon to leave this country for the States, in the Prophet's part displayed his fine voice to the best advantage. The choir sang with great fluency, and exhibited a peculiarly good blending tone. It was stated by more than one journalist that Dr. Brewer was so quick with his tempi that in the first half of the oratorio twenty minutes were gained from the allotted time. But the comparison was made with a previous performance which included Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' overture.

On the same evening, in the Cathedral, Brahms's Symphony No. 2, in D major, was given with imposing effect, and it was followed by a very impressive performance of 'The dream of Gerontius,' under the direction of the composer. Mr. John Coates reassumed the part of Gerontius for the first time, we believe, since his return to England, and invested it with all that peculiar expressiveness that distinguished his interpretation when the work was first performed. Mr. Dalton Baker was the Priest, and Miss Phyllis Lett the Angel, a part with which she is now identified.

BACH'S 'ST. MATTHEW' PASSION MUSIC.

This sublime work was given in the Cathedral on the morning and afternoon of September 10. The Elgar-Atkins edition was used, and Dr. Brewer conducted. Mr. Ivor Atkins accompanied recitatives on the pianoforte, and Dr. Sinclair was at the organ. The performance was in many respects a fine one, if it did not rise to exceptional heights. The soloists, eminent as they were, did not always realise the message of the exacting solos, but nevertheless there were many fine moments in their performances. Mr. Elwes sang the part of the Evangelist with his customary penetrating expressiveness and touching appeal. The other principal singers were Madame Gleeson-White, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Dalton Baker (Christus), and Mr. Robert Radford; Miss Dorothy Silk (soprano), also had a small share of the music, in which her excellent voice and style were very effective. Another new-comer of great promise was Miss Alys Gear (contralto). Her voice has attractive quality, and she sang the recitative, 'O gracious God' (No. 60), with deep feeling and breadth of style. Mr. John Booth (tenor) also showed capacity in all with which he was entrusted. The beautiful violin solo to the alto aria, 'Have mercy, Lord, on me' (No. 47), was adequately played by Mr. W. H. Reed. As to the choruses, the Festival Choir now know them as thoroughly as those of any other work they sing. From where we were seated the attack and tone seemed first-rate, and some of the dramatic features of the choral writing were thrillingly realised. The chorales, however, were rather formal, and did not have all the solemn beauty one looked for in these exquisitely-harmonized melodies. The wood-wind accompaniments to the solos made their usual pathetic appeal.

At the evening concert, given in the Shire Hall on the same day, the following was the programme:

Overture	'Macbeth'		Sullivan
Monologue of Hans Sachs ('Meistersingers')		Mr. Harry Dearth.	Wagner
a. Danse Sacré; b. Danse Profane.		Harp, Mr. C. Collier.	Debussy
New Scena for Soprano and Orchestra			Sibelius
'Luonnotar,' from 'Kalevala.'	Runo I.	Madame Ackté.
Ballad		'Sir Patrick Spens'	A. Herbert Brewer
(For Baritone Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.)		Soloist, Mr. Harry Dearth.
Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra in B flat (Op. 67)		Dr. Camille Saint-Saëns.	Mozart
Aria		'Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix'	C. Saint-Saëns
Scherzo Caprice..		Miss Phyllis Lett.
Closing Scene		'Will o' the Wisp'	W. H. Reed
		'Salome'	Richard Strauss
Carnival Overture		Madame Ackté.
			Dvorák

This programme drew an audience that filled every corner of the Shire Hall. In the Debussy pieces the playing of Mr. C. Collier was astonishingly fine, and was duly rewarded by enthusiastic applause. The new Sibelius tone-poem was sung in Finnish by Madame Ackté, but not even the English translation supplied made the subject very intelligible. It deals with a Finnish myth which relates the birth of the universe—a favourite legendary topic. The orchestral undercurrent seemed more interesting than the vocal part, but, as with most of this composer's works, one has to exert faith that there is more in the music than is apparent on one hearing. Dr. Brewer's 'Ballad' was a great contrast, for here the idiom and meaning were clear. It belongs to the category of breezy music, and as such is a very good example. The work was sung con amore by the choir and Mr. Dearth.

Dr. Saint-Saëns played the Mozart Concerto with attractive neatness of style, and seemed to enjoy his performance as much as did the audience. Here at least was clarity. 'Will o' the Wisp' was brilliantly performed, under the guidance of the composer. Part of the music justifies the title, but there are passages of a more strident nature—glad in themselves, but with not much suggestion of the elusive phenomenon. The 'Salome' scene was looked forward to with mixed feelings. It is a thing to shudder at, and not to see! Madame Ackté was at her terrible, delicious best in her interpretation. Her facial expression was extraordinary, and it was marvellous that without action she could lay bare her hectic temperament so completely through only her voice and style. The audience was amazed and fascinated.

On the morning of the 11th the new oratorio, 'The Promised Land,' was brought forward under the baton of the composer, Dr. Saint-Saëns. It has been stated that this work was commissioned by the Festival Committee, but this is not correct. It was evolved quite independently, and was chosen by the Committee on the strength of the reputation of the distinguished composer, and as a means of doing him honour. It is a comparatively short work, occupying only about an hour in performance. As we gave a full account of the libretto, which is by Mr. Hermann Klein, and the plan of the construction of the oratorio in our August number, we need not again describe them here.

The music has been criticised on the ground that for a new work composed in these times it is not sufficiently modern in its idiom. But even if this be admitted—and we are not disposed seriously to question the criticism—we think there will be a considerable number of concert-goers who will not grieve on this account. The choruses especially are likely to please performers. They are numerous, well-developed, broad, and comparatively simple, and occasionally contrapuntal in the style beloved by most choralists. The instrumental prelude is a fit preparation for the simply-constructed double-chorus with which the work begins. Then the music becomes dramatic, and a baritone solo (Moses) has some beautiful passages. There is no attempt at a suggestion of realism in the striking of the rock, but the instrumental figure that follows this episode is brilliant, and the succeeding chorus makes a good climax. Now ensue reflective passages which again employ double-chorus with majestic effect. The simplicity of the vocal part here is remarkable, and the result is a great choral richness, because every singer can give attention to sonority. A duet with Moses and Aaron follows, and leads to a quartet for the solo choruses that we imagine would sound better as a full chorus. Another double-chorus with much-varied expression succeeds, and in the middle is worked up to a fine climax.

A bold and somewhat original movement, 'The song of Moses,' for bass solo (Moses) and choir, introduces a flowing melody with a pronounced rhythmic lilt which is responsively treated in almost operatic style. Narrative solos follow, in which there is some beautiful instrumental colouring, and these passages lead into the final chorus movement, which is of considerable dimensions, and like so many other of the choruses, distinguished by breadth and opportunity for big effects. The soloists were Miss Ruth Vincent, Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Phyllis Lett, Miss Alys Gear, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Robert Radford.

Sir Hubert Parry's Te Deum Laudamus, which since its performance at Hereford in 1900 has been much revised and adapted to English words, was the next item. It is a work of much nobility, and we think contains some of the composer's finest choral writing. Miss Ruth Vincent, Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Alys Gear, and Mr. Robert Radford were the soloists.

After the interval, a new, unaccompanied Motet, 'Ye Holy Angels bright' (founded upon 'Darwall's 148th') by Sir Charles Stanford, was performed. It was fairly effective, and the last section brilliantly exhibited the contrapuntal facility of the composer.

A fine performance of Elgar's Symphony in E flat (No. 2), made a profound impression. It may be that the work appeals most to the educated musician, but undoubtedly appreciation is deepened by closer acquaintance. The Larghetto especially was beautifully played. The composer conducted.

On the evening of the 11th, in the Cathedral, Verdi's 'Requiem' was on the whole splendidly performed under Dr. Brewer. Madame Ackté was the soprano, and again found scope for her remarkable power of vivid interpretation. But the intensity of her feeling occasionally betrayed her into disregard of the musical factors, which, under a less capable conductor, might have been disastrous. Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Dalton Baker were the other soloists. The prelude from 'Parsifal' (Wagner) followed, and was listened to with rapt attention. A selection from 'Israel in Egypt' concluded the proceedings.

The 'Messiah' as usual wound up the Festival. It was given in the Cathedral in the morning and afternoon of the 12th. The soloists were Miss Vincent, Madame Crossley, Mr. Coates, and Mr. Radford.

There were the usual pleasant social functions, in which the Mayor and others entertained many guests sumptuously. A tribute of respect and warm thanks is due to Mr. F. Barrett Cooke, the secretary to the Stewards. He was always helpful and patient—even with the Press representatives.

FROM THE PARIS 'FIGARO.'

It is certain that in assigning the work to an English musical Festival, the French musician took means to ensure its production under the best conditions, and the most auspicious for an understanding of its true merits. Nowhere else, least of all in France, could he have discovered the magnificently sonorous choirs for which his finest and most significant pages are designed. Moreover, nowhere else would a presentment of the work so thoroughly in accord with its spirit have been realised. This spacious cathedral, now for the moment a hall of music, this auditorium withheld as if by a conscience from the participation in a wholly secular concert, and yet reflecting the feeling that there was in truth no question of a religious service—this sufficed to evoke the true atmosphere of oratorio; of oratorio, that is, as it was conceived by Handel rather than by Bach, and just that type of music of which we have no idea in France. Of course, never for an instant was it the intention of a master like Saint-Saëns to write a Handelian pastiche. In spite of some external and unimportant similarities, 'The Promised Land' is quite original and written in the true manner of Saint-Saëns and of Saint-Saëns alone. It is no less true that the work proceeds from a type of thought no longer familiar to us, which survives in these great gatherings where the musical traditions of the wider English public find their vent.

While the French composer still, at all times, retains his familiar melodic invention and technical methods, he has none the less strictly accepted the convention of the oratorio type. The work does not set out to be dramatic or pictorial. It is simply lyrical and decorative, in a manner much akin to that of the great French motets of the 17th and 18th centuries.

At a time when nearly all composers reject, M. Saint-Saëns accepts the fixed musical forms with which classical musicians were satisfied. It is scarcely necessary to assert, I imagine, that such a musician—and truly he is a musician—has been able to show that not one of these forms is lacking in beauty when treated with musicianship. It may be that the composer was attracted into these paths by a reaction, undeniably legitimate, against certain excesses in contemporary art. Some such feeling must have suggested that conscious simplicity and sobriety which are noticeable throughout the work, and beyond question do nothing to detract from its best pages.

The fact is that this sobriety and simplicity are those of a master. What matter if the fine orchestral prelude disdains the complication and complexities of sound in which modern ingenuity and artifice revel, since it remains magnificently sonorous and broad in outline? The orchestra by its silence often helps to reveal the imposing architecture of the double choir; does that interrupt the constant clarity and purity of the music? The idea of giving double responding support—vocal and instrumental—to the song of Moses, 'My speech shall distil as the dew,' in no way spoils—rather the contrary—the delicious originality of this melody, with its delicate popular appeal. One must draw the conclusion, nowadays not without its instructiveness, that the effect of a work has no necessary connection with the complexity of the means employed.

Possibly this special character of M. Saint-Saëns's new work came as a surprise to some listeners, or, at least, to some critics, for it must be said that the present tendency in English sacred music is by no means in the direction of simplicity. The best composers in this sphere seek to import into their compositions that are destined for Festival use all the expressive, harmonic, and orchestral resources of the most advanced and complicated art.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The first of the novelties that call for mention in this month's report is a Fantasia on two popular Angevin airs by the prematurely-deceased French composer, Guillaume Lekeu. It is not ordinary music, and as played on August 21 made pleasant hearing. Two orchestral pieces, 'The twilight of the year' and 'Paradise birds,' by Cyril Scott, heard on August 26, illustrate poems by the composer with some truth and effectiveness. Mr. Scott's manner and his cleverness are felt in every bar, and his power to suggest an atmosphere or an idea rises higher than it is wont. On August 28, Mr. Alfred Quaife played a new Pianoforte concerto by Glazounow, that was good music-making rather than inspiration. On the same evening, Mr. Julius Harrison's set of Variations on 'Down among the dead men,' which was one of the successes of last year's season, was given under the composer's direction.

Dr. Vaughan Williams's Suite from his incidental music to 'The Wasps' was played on September 2, and was better understood than when it came last of an exacting series of novelties at a Patron's Fund concert. Its vigour and original telling humour made an instantaneous appeal to the audience, and the work earned a great popular success.

A suite of pieces drawn from Stravinsky's famous ballet 'L'oiseau de feu' was given on September 4. For those who had witnessed the ballet on the stage the music had a definite meaning and connection that were lost to the less fortunate listeners. But all could appreciate the daring and sure-handed originality of the music.

On September 6 a member of the Queen's Hall first violins, Mr. Eugene Goossens, junr., was honoured with a performance of his 'Variations on an old Chinese theme.' The tune was pentatonic, and not outwardly suggestive as a subject for development, but the composer has made varied and interesting play with it, and, for a musician of twenty years, showed resourceful powers.

Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill's Prelude to Yeats's 'The King's threshold,' heard on September 9, was of characteristic value in its finished writing, scholarly manner, and level-headedness. At the same concert, Sir Henry Wood conducted a stirring performance of Strauss's 'Ein Heldenleben.' On September 11, a Suite by Reynaldo Hahn for wood-wind, harp, and pianoforte was listened to without great interest. Sir Henry Wood was the pianist and Mr. F. B. Kiddle conducted. Mr. Blair Fairchild's suite, 'Tamineh,' heard on September 16, expresses Orientalism in somewhat serious and unenterprising terms.

The announcement of Debussy's set of 'Images,' entitled 'Iberia,' for September 19, aroused high expectations which were not entirely disappointed. The scenes it sets out to depict, 'By streets and roads,' 'Perfumes of the night,' and 'Morning of a feast-day,' are seen through decidedly Debussian spectacles: that is to say, they are wittily described. Wit and cleverness are the outstanding features of the Suite, and its musical quality occupies second place, although there are passages—notably, the fading away of the second movement into the entrance of the third—which appeal to all as moments of musical beauty. We hope to hear the work again.

THE SEASON AT LA SCALA, MILAN.

By CLAUDE TREVOR.

The famous Milan Opera House will open its doors on the 1st of this month with a season dedicated entirely to the works of Verdi, to celebrate the 100th anniversary of his birth, and will last till the middle of November, when the regular season will continue its course till April 15 of next year. The Verdi operas will include 'Nabucco,' 'Aida,' 'Otello,' and 'Falstaff,' also his 'Messa da Requiem.' While speaking of the great Italian composer one cannot refrain from expressing regret (to speak mildly) that England, supposed to be making such marvellous progress in musical matters, should be the one country with any pretensions to true love of the art in Europe to remain absolutely passive as to celebrating this event, considering the millions who have been delighted for close upon a century by the genius of the Grand Old Man of Italian Opera! Further comment is useless. The list of operas following the season just referred to is particularly interesting, and includes 'Parsifal,' which is fixed for

January 1, and is receiving the greatest care in its production. Besides a strong cast for the principal parts, twenty-four special artists have been engaged for the Scene of the Flowers, while the chorus will number 150. Fuchs has been engaged as stage director, he at present holding that position at the Court Theatre, Munich. He was the first to place 'Parsifal' on the stage at Bayreuth under the personal supervision of Wagner himself. Prior to the première of this work, on the evening of November 18 will be produced Mascagni and d'Annunzio's new opera 'Parisina,' founded on Lord Byron's not very savoury poem of the same name. It is worth mentioning that Donizetti tackled the subject at a time when his music was so much in vogue, and it was given for the first time at the Pergola Theatre, Florence, and subsequently at Paris and London, but although the cast included some of the greatest singers of the epoch it failed to draw, and very soon fell out of the regular repertoire. 'Tristan' will be heard during the season, also 'L'Amore dei tre Re,' brought out last year, while two more absolute novelties will be heard: 'Abisso,' by Antonio Smareglia, and 'L'Ombra di Don Giovanni' (The Shade of Don Giovanni), by Franco Alfano. In the lengthy list of singers one sees several Covent Garden favourites, among whom are Sammarco, Zenatello, and Scotti. Two new ballets will be witnessed, one entitled 'Il Salice d'Oro' (The Golden Willow), but the other is not yet named. It is to be given in January, and is by Hassreiter, well known in Italy as the composer of 'La Fata delle Bambole' (The Doll Fairy), which some years ago had an immense success on the Continent. The former ballet has been composed by Riccardo Pink-Mangiagalli, who, besides writing the music, has arranged the story and scenic part as well. Having spoken of the Verdi celebrations at the Scala it may not be uninteresting to some readers to learn something of other celebrations at the Royal Theatre of Parma, which commenced on September 6, under the direction of Signor Campanini, when Verdi's very first opera was exhumed for the occasion—his 'Oberto Conte di Bonifacio.' It was written for the Scala, and given there on November 17, 1839, and was brought forward for the benefit of a charity. It was while Verdi was conducting a Haydn oratorio at Milan that the impresario Macini recommended the young composer (he was then twenty-six) to Merelli, at that time manager of the Scala, who undertook to introduce 'Oberto,' and the editor Ricordi bought it for a not very munificent sum. It ran for fourteen evenings, while two other operas by well-known composers of that time—Panizza and Ricci—one a comic work and the other serious, were withdrawn after two or three representations. Although it bears undeniable traces of its seventy-four years, and will probably never be heard again, yet here and there it has certain moments which seem to foreshadow the Verdi of later years. One of the critics of 1839 wrote of it: 'It seems that the youthful composer possesses a happy gift of melody!' In conjunction with the opera at Parma was given the ballet of the 'Four Seasons' from the same composer's 'Vesperi Siciliani.'

VOICE-TRAINING: PAST AND PRESENT.

By F. C. FIELD HYDE.

This lecture was given in the Queen's (Small) Hall on September 8. The syllabus was as follows:

Rise of Italian Opera—Its demands upon Singers—Birth of the Voice-Training Art—Its rapid development—Some famous Teachers—How they taught—A Decline—Rise of the Scientific School—Its Challenge and its Promise—Capitulation of the Old Masters—A Consideration of Methods as regards (a) Breathing; (b) Development of tone—The Old Masters vindicated—Considerations for present-day teachers.

The lecturer managed to cover a good deal of ground in the short time at his disposal, backing up his remarks with some interesting diagrams and experiments. Particularly sound was his treatment of the question of breathing, while the fallacies of the ultra-physiological school of teaching received some hard knocks. Much laughter greeted the reading of extracts from an American teacher of singing by correspondence, who at great length instructed a distant pupil how to discover his tonsils—organs that as a rule discover themselves only too easily. Half-a-dozen songs were sung by two of Mr. Hyde's pupils, who, if they had suffered from only one-half of the physical drawbacks which the lecturer told us had handicapped them, would still be striking examples of what can be done by hard work. One may suggest, by the way, to the young lady who sang 'Annie Laurie' that such a song requires simpler interpretative methods than she employed—methods which were quite in keeping with the operatic extract which preceded it. The difference between the two should be as that between a wild-flower and a cultivated bloom. There was a good attendance, and the lecture altogether was a thoroughly practical, common-sense treatment of a branch of musical pedagogy that more than any other lends itself to windy pretence.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

Our musical season was inaugurated by a fortnight's representation of grand opera on a scale of considerable magnitude, by Herr Ernst Denhof's opera company, the first work represented being a grand revival of Gluck's classical opera, 'Orpheus and Eurydice,' which took place at the Prince of Wales Theatre on September 16. The whole house on that occasion had been secured by the local committee of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and presented a brilliant 'coup d'œil.' Of the utmost interest was the first performance here of Strauss's 'Elektra' and 'Rosenkavalier,' and Debussy's 'Pelleas and Melisande.' The repertoire also included Mozart's 'Magic Flute,' Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' and the 'Mastersingers.' Further reference to these productions has to be kept over till next month. The local concert season has scarcely yet begun, and much work will be carried on during October, November, and December.

BOURNEMOUTH.

Never in the history of Bournemouth has there been such a fund of good concerts, or such a galaxy of fine artists as in the current summer musical season. As regards the actual music performed, bolder measures are taken and severer fare is presented in the winter, but there is not now that great discrepancy between the two seasons that at one time prevailed. Take, for instance, the principal features of the orchestral concerts during the last few weeks. Without touching upon Mr. Rutland Boughton's 'Dancing Scenery' experiment, which is dealt with elsewhere in this issue, there remain Mr. Mark Hambourg's virile, though on some points debatable performance of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto; Mr. Vernon Warner's version of the first movement of the same work, which, even while suppressing any comparison with Mr. Hambourg's stupendous interpretation, impressed us as being rather tame and perfunctory; Miss Daisy Kennedy's performance at the same concert, of the opening movement of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, wherein this talented young performer displayed her mettle and an unusual promise that will assuredly mature into an abundance of achievement beyond the attainment of the majority of performers; and the fine Wagner concert on September 11, at which the soloists, Miss Carrie Tubbs, Mr. Thorpe Bates, and Mr. Alfred Heather, our gifted conductor, Mr. Dan Godfrey, and the instrumentalists afforded the enormous audience two hours of solid enjoyment. The big duet from the 'Flying Dutchman,' and the closing scene from 'Die Götterdämmerung,' were the chief excerpts performed, Miss Tubbs especially distinguishing herself by the charm and fervour of her singing.

It will thus be seen that there is no lowering of the standard in the holiday season, nor does any disposition to pander to depraved tastes evince itself. There is, of course, a greater reliance upon the most popular works of favourite composers, but there is nothing to complain about in that, although, possibly, one or two compositions have been drawn upon a little too frequently. The weekly Symphony Concerts have similarly conformed to the season's requirements. Brahms's second Symphony, Schubert's 'Unfinished'

Symphony, the Symphony Pathétique (Tchaikovsky), the 'Carnaval Romain' overture (Berlioz), Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' Saint-Saëns's 'Danse Macabre,' and the 'Hebrides' overture (Mendelssohn) have formed the staple items of the concerts, and in the majority of instances Mr. Godfrey and the orchestra could hardly have improved upon their performance; the beautiful Schubert Symphony—always delightful to hear under Mr. Godfrey's baton—was particularly well played. Two members of the orchestra, Mr. Walter Leah (clarinet) and Mr. Jean Gennin (flute), have again proved their worth as soloists.

Following his appearance at one of the orchestral concerts, Mr. Mark Hambourg gave an interesting Chopin recital on September 6, and ballad concerts have been supplied by Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Geoffrey Seabrooke, Mr. Haydn Wood, and Miss Marjorie Wigley, and by Mr. Charles Tree, M. Zacharewitsch and party. It was both curious and instructive to notice the success attending that now ubiquitous style of concert, the recital, and the plainly evident waning in the public favour of the older type of 'ballad concert': which, in parenthesis, is all for the good of the art. Another noteworthy characteristic of the concerts that have lately taken place here is the increasing number of entertainments depending upon 'one composer' programmes.

A few days after these notes appear we shall be entering upon the winter season of concerts. Reference to that subject must, however, be postponed until next month; it is sufficient to remark here—disregarding all other arrangements—that the nineteenth series of Symphony Concerts promises to be fully as important and ambitious as any that have preceded it.

BRISTOL.

Some of the musical Societies have resumed their practices. The Bristol Choral Society (conductor, Mr. George Riseley) will take in hand during the season 'The Lay of the Bell' (Max Bruch), 'Kubla Khan' (Coleridge-Taylor), 'Elijah,' 'Messiah,' and 'Parsifal' (Wagner). Bristol New Philharmonic Society (conductor, Mr. Arnold Barter) have chosen 'A Sea Symphony' (Vaughan Williams), 'Landerkenning' (Grieg), 'Two Eastern Pictures' (Gustav von Holst), and 'The Mystic Trumpeter' (Hamilton Harty). Bristol Musical Society (Mr. C. W. Stear, conductor) will practise 'Ulysses and the Sirens' (Puget), and 'The Redemption' (Gounod). The Clifton Choral Society (under the direction of Mr. A. Ernest Hill) are preparing for their annual concert 'Les cloches de Corneville' (Planquette) and 'The Revenge' (Stanford). For the Lenten performances they will practise Part I of 'The Redemption' and 'The Crucifixion' (Stainer).

Monthly organ recitals at St. Mary Redcliff Church have attracted large numbers of listeners. Mr. R. T. Morgan (organist of the church) and Mr. Hubert Hunt (Bristol Cathedral) have given recitals, and Mr. Douglas G. A. Fox (Keble College, Oxford) will be the organist for October.

CAMBRIDGE.

Two concerts were given last term by the Musical Society. The first of these was a chamber concert by Madame Bathori and the London String Quartet. Debussy's Quartet and three smaller English works, including Balfour Gardiner's Quartet in one movement, were beautifully played. Madame Bathori sang many songs by modern French composers, accompanied by Mr. Denis Browne. One seldom has an opportunity in this town of hearing a concert of modern French and English chamber music by such first-rate artists.

At the second concert, during May week, the Society's choir and orchestra performed Dvorák's 'Te Deum.' The choir also showed much pluck and very considerable improvement in Bach's motet, 'Sing to the Lord,' and the orchestra gave a really fine performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony. We believe that Dr. Rootham, with his untiring energy, proposes to produce the B minor Mass and Berlioz's 'Faust' during next year.

Mr. Sedley Taylor has offered the University a lectureship on 'Musical form and analysis.' Cambridge music already owes Mr. Taylor a great debt. One hopes that this will mark a great step towards providing, for those who are studying for musical degrees, a system of education such as is afforded in other subjects.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The preparations for the coming season in the Three Towns are dishearteningly meagre. Therefore the more praise is due to the few who are showing the spirit of enterprise, for music is at so low an ebb, particularly in instrumental flow, that no small amount of courage is demanded for the launching of any scheme. The Misses Smith are still brave, in spite of an adverse balance each year, and have announced another series of musical matinées for which they have secured the English String Quartet, Miss May Mukle, Mr. Percy Grainger, Dr. Georg Henschel, Miss Elsie Swinton, and Madame Amy Dewhurst. The Madrigal Society, the formation of which was hinted at last month, has been formally organized, with Dr. Harold Lake as conductor. Rehearsals will begin with the month of October, and unaccompanied part-singing of all types will receive attention.

Several works new to Plymouth will be played by Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society at two concerts. On the first occasion Haydn's Symphony in D will be heard, after which the Wagner centenary will be recognised by four excerpts from 'Götterdämmerung' and 'Die Meistersinger.' A local musician, Mr. Gerald B. Phillips, will be honoured at the second concert by the performance of his Poem for orchestra, 'Autumn,' specially composed for the occasion. Mr. Phillips's work has not hitherto received the encouragement and recognition which it deserves. In the same programme the Symphony will be Tchaikovsky's fourth, and the Overture to Borodin's 'Prince Igor' will be one of several smaller novelties. Rheinberger's Organ concerto (Op. 177) will be played, with Mr. Lewis Sydenham as soloist.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The only possible adjustment of the position of choral music at Exeter as represented by the Oratorio Society and Western Counties Musical Association and the Choral Society has been arrived at by amalgamation. The three bodies will henceforth be one, with the somewhat clumsy arrangement of a trio of conductors, Dr. H. J. Edwards, Dr. D. J. Wood, and Mr. Allan Allen. From such a combination of brains, something more exciting in the way of a programme might have been expected than 'The Messiah' and 'Elijah,' but such is the scheme adopted, with the probable addition of a third and newer work.

A new organ was opened at Yelverton (St. Paul's) church on August 27, by Mr. Winfield, and on the 28th a similar ceremony was performed in Hatherleigh Parish church, when Mr. P. Laing-Oldham (lord of the manor of Hatherleigh) officiated at an instrument which had cost £450. At his annual organ recital at Ottery St. Mary, on September 3, Mr. Stanley Chipperfield played Guilman's Sonata in D minor. Miss Dorothy Scholes (vocalist) and Miss Katherine Martin (violinist) contributed to the programme. Lady Churston (Miss Denise Orme) sang at a charity concert at Brixham, on September 3, the other performers being Miss Hilda Fogwill, Madame Margaret C. Nixon, Mr. Walter Dennis, Mr. Jack Harris, and Mr. Arthur Castle and Miss Worth. On September 14, the Rev. P. Mallett, of London, at an organ recital in St. Allen's Parish Church, played some of the smaller works of Karg-Elert, and others by D'Evry, Dvůřák, and Wagner. The music in the Torquay Pavilion continues to flourish exceedingly, the Municipal Band under Mr. Basil Hindenberg creating an ever-growing interest by the fresh ideas put forth. Grand opera nights, symphony concerts, one-composer programmes, and 'request' programmes are only some of the ingenuous means by which large audiences are continually attracted. A visit from Madame Kirkby Lunn, on September 10, was an occasion of special success; and Mr. Harold Samuel, pianist, played the Schumann Concerto on September 17.

CORNWALL.

At the annual meeting of Falmouth Philharmonic Society a balance in hand was announced of £2 3s. 2d. as the result of special efforts to wipe off a deficit. Canon Corfe will continue as conductor of the choir, and Miss Treweeke of the orchestra.

Under the organization of Mr. Charles Saunders, a party of visitors gave concerts at Bude, August 28, and Stratton, August 25. In addition to the well-known tenor artist, the performers were Miss Jessie Attwell (pianist), Miss Clara Robins, and Miss Rose Lloyd-King (elocutionist). The Mousehole Male Choir, conducted by Mr. W. R. Bryant, contributed part-songs and glees to a concert at Lamorna (St. Buryan) on September 6, when the solo vocalists were Messrs. R. Pentreath, Edward Glasson, W. Harvey, and John Matthews. Ensemble music was played at Beer, on September 10, by Miss Violet Shapcott (violin), Miss W. Howes (violinello), and Mr. W. C. Walton (pianoforte).

The choir of Princes Street Congregational Church, Devonport, sang Dr. Ferris Tozer's cantata 'The two Harvests' at Torpoint on September 10. Mr. E. J. Lane was the organist and conductor, and obtained also good performances of choruses from 'The Creation' and 'Elijah.' At Falmouth, on September 14, a concert of unusual interest was given by the combined male choirs from Marazion and Falmouth Adult Schools. A total of eighty voices was thus secured, and the singing of 'O Father, Whose almighty power' (Handel), 'Perfect in Christ,' 'The Hebrew captives,' and 'The sea fight' (Palliard), was inspiring. The Marazion men were prize-winners at the last Cornish Competitions Festival, and their conductor, Mr. J. H. Trudgen shared the baton on this occasion with Mr. E. E. Howard, of the Falmouth choir.

The first event of what is hoped will become a permanent establishment of band contests in South Cornwall took place at Lelant on August 30. Mr. Jesse Manley adjudicated, and expressed his surprise at the excellent standard of playing. Camborne band carried off the chief honours of the day, winning first prize in the premier section (test piece, 'Emilia') and three of the solo medals. Nine bands engaged in the contests.

DUBLIN.

The chief musical event of the summer season here has been the visit of the London Symphony Orchestra (fifty-two members) under Mr. Hamilton Harty's conductorship. The concerts were given in the Woodbrook Hall (kindly lent by Mr. Stanley Cochrane) during the week of August 11-16. The orchestral works performed included Beethoven's Fifth, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathétique,' and Harty's 'Irish' Symphonies, Strauss's 'Don Juan' (the most important novelty produced), Tchaikovsky's and Mendelssohn's Violin concertos (soloist, Isolde Menges), Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor (soloist, Mr. W. H. Reed), and Rachmaninoff's Pianoforte concerto (soloist, Mr. Victor Love). Vocalists who sang during the week were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Nora Borel, Miss Carmen Hill, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, and Mr. Cormac O'Shane. One concert was devoted to the works of Tchaikovsky, one to those of Wagner (this was repeated on the Saturday afternoon by request), and the remaining four were miscellaneous. A fine organ, recently installed in the Hall by the Æolian Company, was heard during the week.

EDINBURGH.

Paterson & Sons' Concert prospectus and calendar for 1913 and 1914 foreshadows a musical season of more than usual interest. The prospectus is a model of its kind, and its contents surprise one who, in the rush of a season, hardly realizes the importance of the happenings around him. Paterson's Orchestral Concerts programmes show three evenings devoted to a Brahms Festival under the conductorship of Fritz Steinbach, one evening to a concert of French music under René Baton, one to a symphony concert under Dr. Henschel, and eight, including a first performance at Edinburgh of Wagner's 'Parsifal,' under Emil Mlynarski.

The names of Mischa Elman and Duci Kerekjarto, Arthur de Greef and Leonard Borwick, John Coates and Charles Knowles, Madame Gleeson-White and Muriel Foster, with many others, complete an outline of this series of concerts. The Royal Choral Union, in addition to assisting in 'Parsifal,' will give a performance of the 'Messiah' in conjunction with the Hallé Orchestra under Mr. Balling. Mr. Kirkhope's Choir will assist at the Brahms Festival, and give a recital of the same composer's 'Requiem.'

The Classical Concerts, which included the Beethoven Festival last season, will this season include four orchestral concerts by the Hallé Orchestra under Mr. Balling.

The remaining concerts of the series are chamber concerts, at which will appear amongst others Rosenthal, Thibaud, Julia Culp, Madame Bathori, the Willaume String Quartet, and the Geloso String Quartet.

Mr. Gottlieb Feuerberg has been elected conductor to the Edinburgh Royal Choral Union in succession to Mr. T. H. Collinson. He was born at Hamburg about forty years ago, became a free scholar at Hamburg and also at the Leipzig Conservatorium of Music, and joined the Bulow Orchestra as a violinist. He was taken by Herr Reiter to Aberdeen as violin master at his school of music there, and as pianoforte and singing master at another school. He returned to Germany, and undertook various duties as the leader of a string quartet, choir instructor, and accompanist. Returning to Scotland, he chose Perth as a centre, travelling as a teacher to Aberdeen, Dundee, and Edinburgh. He is conductor of an amateur orchestra at Edinburgh, in succession to Mr. Gade; St. Johnstone's Orchestral Society, Perth; and the Philharmonic (Choral) Society, Forfar.

GLASGOW.

For his sixteenth series of organ recitals at the Cathedral, which began on August 26, Mr. Herbert Walton secured the co-operation of Mr. H. E. Ellingford, Mr. Bernard Johnson, and Mr. E. H. Lemare, whose performances attracted large audiences. Mr. G. T. Pattman has resumed his monthly recitals on the fine organ at St. Mary's Cathedral.

The prospectus of the Choral and Orchestral Union for the coming season has just been issued. The season will cover a period of thirteen weeks, during which there will be fourteen classical concerts and fourteen Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts. The choral works to be performed are Dr. Walford Davies's 'Song of Saint Francis,' Bach's 'Sing ye to the Lord,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' Verdi's 'Requiem,' Bantock's 'Omar Khayyam' (Part 1), and 'The Messiah.' With the exception of the 'Requiem,' all the choral concerts will be conducted by Mr. Henri Verbruggen, and Mr. Emil Mlynarski will again be orchestral commander-in-chief. The Bach Choir's programme for the session will include two very interesting chamber concerts, the Christmas oratorio, 'Watch and pray,' and selections from 'Sing to the Lord,' 'Be not afraid,' 'O Light Everlasting,' and 'God's time is the best.' The Western Choral Union, under Mr. Wilfrid E. Senior, will give Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and miscellaneous pieces by Brahms, Elgar, &c. Under the same conductor, the Grand Opera Society will prepare 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and 'Pagliacci'; the Ayr Choral Union, Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan'; and Stirling Choral Society, Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony.' The Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. H. S. Robertson) will give a classical Scottish concert and a miscellaneous concert at Glasgow, besides fulfilling engagements in London, Birmingham, Leeds, &c. For his next series of chamber concerts Mr. A. M. Henderson has engaged Mr. Georg Henschel and the St. Petersburg Quartet. Mr. Philip E. Halstead has arranged an attractive series of chamber concerts to be given in the new galleries of the Royal Institute of Fine Arts. The Young Men's Christian Association Choir (Mr. R. L. Reid) will make 'The Messiah' their chief subject of study.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The passing of the summer days and the approach of winter chills are somewhat mitigated by the announcement that the first concert of the Philharmonic Society is fixed for October 14. This concert, as well as the second on October 28, will be conducted by M. Safonoff, the orchestral items including Schubert's Symphony in C, No. 9, Boerresen's overture 'The Normans,' and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4, 'Mozartiana,' and Pathetic Symphony. Mr. Busoni is announced as solo pianist and conductor of the third concert. Sir Frederic Cowen will be welcomed at the fourth concert, an outstanding feature of which will be Beethoven's C minor Symphony, of which Sir Frederic's interpretation is especially impressive. The programme also contains Coleridge-Taylor's Dance Rhapsodie 'La Bamboula,' and Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, to be played by M. Paul Kochanski. M. Gabriel Pierné conducts the fifth concert, at which his overture 'Ramuntcho,' and Lalo's 'Rhapsodie Norvegienne' will be heard. Great things are chorally expected from the Christmas performance of the 'Messiah' on December 23, which Mr. Harry Evans will prepare, and the first concert in the New Year will be directed by Mr. Max Fiedler. An interesting programme is drawn up for the eighth concert, for which Mr. Hamilton Harty is engaged. It will include his clever Symphonic-poem, 'With the wild geese,' which has already been favourably heard at these concerts, and also Rachmaninoff's second Pianoforte concerto, to be played by the composer. Sir Frederic Cowen will conduct the ninth and tenth concerts. At the former of these, Elgar's 'Caractacus' and Mr. Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter' will be performed, and for the tenth concert M. Alfred Cortot is engaged as solo pianist. Mr. Landon Ronald will conduct the eleventh and twelfth concerts. It will be seen from this brief outline that the committee have succeeded in drawing up an attractive scheme in keeping with their present forward policy and determination to maintain the high prestige and brilliant record of these famous concerts.

The vocalists announced include Miss Tilly Koenen, Miss Florence Macbeth, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Kirby Lunn, Madame Doris Woodall, Miss Ruth Vincent, Madame Lulu Myszk-Gmeiner, with Messrs. Sammarco, Gervase Elwes, F. Ranaflow, Walter Hyde, Thorpe Bates, and Robert Radford; and among the instrumentalists the names of two eminent violoncello players, M. Belousoff and Pablo Casals, with that of Miss Isolde Menges (violin), also appear.

The Philharmonic Society's weekly choral rehearsals began on Monday, September 8, under the direction of the new resident choral conductor, Mr. Harry Evans, and there is every indication that the choral singing this season will reach an unusually high standard.

The annual Festival of the Liverpool Church Choir Association will be held in St. George's Hall on December 4. On this occasion—the thirteenth of these interesting and useful functions—Sir Hubert Parry will be the committee's distinguished guest, and will conduct his anthem, 'Hear My words, ye people,' and the final chorus from his oratorio 'Judith,' 'Put off, O Jerusalem.' The experiment of including a short complete choral work as a change from the usual choice of disconnected anthems or services is to be tried at this Festival, when Mendelssohn's unfinished oratorio 'Christus' is to be essayed. On Sir Hubert's recommendation, local composers will be represented by a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis written by Mr. Samuel Lees, organist of Bebbington Parish Church; and another locally interesting piece will be Mr. Townshend Driffield's anthem for male voices, 'The Lord is gracious.' The choral items are only five in number, but it will be seen they are of a type which will very fully test the powers of the choirs and choirmasters engaged. It is satisfactory to find that the applications from choirs for inclusion in the Festival show no sign of diminution; on the contrary, many choirs are again unavoidably shut out owing to lack of space in the main orchestra and in the adjacent side galleries.

The prospectus of the forthcoming concerts of the Welsh Choral Union indicates undiminished vitality, and the famous choir upon whose material Mr. Harry Evans has so signally stamped his personality will be heard on four occasions, at the first of which, on November 15, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The death of Minnehaha' will be sung. The second concert, on December 20, is to be devoted to the 'Messiah,' of which work last year's experiment of giving two performances on the same day will not be repeated. On February 14, Mr. Granville Bantock's new choral work, 'The Vanity of Vanities,' which he has specially written for the Welsh Choral Union, will be produced; and at the final concert, on March 28, Brahms's 'Requiem' is an entirely suitable choice. It is matter for congratulation that at last this noble work will engage the attention of Mr. Harry Evans's temperamentally-suited chorallists, whose successes have been brought about by unbounded trust in their leader. He on his side very fully reciprocates an attachment so unmistakably shown. It is satisfactory to hear that Mr. Harry Evans's new appointment with the Philharmonic Society will in no sense interfere with his arrangements with the Welsh Choral Union.

The Liverpool Choral Society, conducted by Mr. P. H. Ingram, are preparing for two choral concerts, the 'Messiah' to be given in the Sun Hall, and Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' bracketed with Sullivan's too-seldom-heard 'Prodigal Son,' in the Central Hall. Mr. Albert Orton has selected Coleridge-Taylor's beautiful work, 'A tale of Old Japan' for the Walton Philharmonic Society's first concert, and it is satisfactory to hear that an orchestra is contemplated in order that the beauty of the instrumental part may be more adequately realised. It is hoped that Mr. Orton's enterprise will be duly supported, and that other Choral Societies will emulate it.

The Catholic Philharmonic Society announce two concerts, of which the first, on December 1, is to be devoted to a miscellaneous programme, while at the second, Mr. H. P. Allen will conduct Mozart's 'Requiem.' Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' will be sung by the Post Office Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Arthur Davies, on December 10, and at the second concert, March 18, Coleridge-Taylor's Rhapsody, 'Kubla Khan,' will be performed for the first time at Liverpool. The only 'Elijah' performance in view is that projected by the Port Sunlight Philharmonic Society on October 30, who at their second concert on December 18 will revive Barnett's 'The Ancient Mariner.'

The West Kirby Choral Society, which under Dr. W. B. Brierley has done such good work in this important Cheshire area, will sing the 'Messiah' on December 16, and Dr. Brierley has conceived the idea of making the event more than usually interesting by inviting the church choirs of all denominations in West Kirby, Hoylake, and Meols to take part, thereby increasing the choral force to 250, and it is arranged for the twelve outside choirs to attend all the Society's usual weekly practices. The outcome of this happy idea will be watched with interest.

Six concerts will be given in the Philharmonic Hall by Mr. Vasco Akeroyd's Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Akeroyd's happy faculty of drawing up programmes which combine the lighter with the serious side of classical music is again shown by the draft prospectus. Under Mr. Akeroyd's direction the Symphony Orchestra has become a finely responsive machine. The first concert of the new series occurs on November 4. Mr. Percy Harrison announces his usual series of four concerts, with a compelling array of star vocalists and instrumentalists whose names are household words, including Madame Tetrazzini, M. Ysaye, and the London Symphony Orchestra conducted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The Sunday Society's syllabus for the ensuing season includes six orchestral concerts to be given in St. George's Hall under the direction of Mr. John Lawson, the Society's alert conductor, whose name is a guarantee that nothing poor or trivial finds a place in the programmes. Of course the concerts do not set out with the primary object of being 'educational,' but it is probable that less profitable ways of spending an hour or two on Sunday evenings are to be found. Three clever pupils of Mr. Osborne Edmondson are to play three Pianoforte concertos—viz., Miss Dorothy Mee (Grieg's), Miss Elsie Webster (Schumann's), and Miss Edith Darbishire (Rubinstein's D minor). The orchestral items promised a first hearing at these concerts include Arthur Hervey's 'Scherzo,' a 'Suite' by G. E. Stutely, and a 'Concert Overture' by Edward Watson, to which pleasurable interest attaches beforehand.

Among the Choral Societies largely stimulated by the personality of a conductor is the Southport and Birkdale, who will sing the 'Messiah' under Mr. Arthur W. Speed, and later, Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' in Holy Trinity Church.

The old-established Societa Armonica, largely composed of keen amateur instrumentalists, are resuming their rehearsals under Mr. Vasco Akeroyd, and preparations for three concerts are being made by the Liscard Orchestral Society, a flourishing Cheshire combination under the direction of Mr. Philip Smart.

The enjoyable fortnightly functions of the Rodewald Concert Club recommence on October 13, and some interesting string-quartet music will be heard during the series of ten concerts. Mr. Ernest Bryson continues in the office of chairman, with Dr. A. W. Pollitt as hon. treasurer.

Mr. Ernst Denhof will hold a fortnight's Operatic Festival in the Shakespeare Theatre, commencing October 27. During the visit Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier' and Debussy's 'Pelléas and Melisande' will be given for the first time at Liverpool, as well as a welcome revival of Mozart's 'Magic Flute.'

The world-famed Sheffield Choir, conducted by Dr. Henry Coward, recently fulfilled a week's engagement at the Liverpool 'Olympia,' where, on each evening, they sang at both 'houses' with great success.

The City Fathers are again providing a number of musical evenings in their syllabus of free lectures for the people, to be given in various centres. The lecturers engaged include Rev. H. H. McCullagh, whose subjects are 'Handel,' 'Grieg and the music of Scandinavia,' and 'Beethoven'; Mr. W. A. Roberts, 'Handel's operas and incidental music'; Miss Mattie Talbot, 'The qualities of good music'; Mr. J. Raymond Tobin, 'Chamber music' and 'English composers of yesterday and to-day'; Mr. Ernest Young, 'West Country folk-songs.'

Two concerts will be given here by the Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Balling, and other welcome visitors from Manchester include the Brodsky Quartet, who will be heard on four occasions. Lovers of chamber music will also be provided for by the Misses McCullagh, and Mr. Stanley Prescott, the latter of whom announces three 'Trio' concerts.

A line of appreciation is due to the extremely useful local Concert Calendar recently issued by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper, the well-known concert agents.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The prospectus of the Hallé Concerts Society (now under the chairmanship of its former treasurer, Mr. Gustav Behrens) appeals to the public to restore to its former eminence the chief source of the Society's income; only by a large increase in the number of subscribers can the concerts be made self-supporting. Balling will again conduct, and in consequence of the huge success of his visit with the Orchestra to Scotland last February, two visits are to be paid to Edinburgh in November and February next. The newcomers to the Hallé concerts at Manchester include Tilly Koenen, Thibaud, Rachmaninoff (who plays his second Concerto), Isolde Menges, and Alfred Cortot. The choral concerts embrace two Wagner evenings—'Parsifal,' Acts 2 and 3, on October 30, and on March 12 the first Act of 'Rienzi' and the second Act of the 'Flying Dutchman'; the Verdi centenary is to be duly celebrated on November 20, with the inevitable 'Manzoni Requiem.' February 5 will bring Bach's B minor Mass—the biggest choral work Balling has yet tackled here; Brahms's 'Schicksalslied,' and the Choral Symphony of Beethoven are also to be given. The orchestral scheme has many interesting features, Holbrooke's 'Queen Mab,' and Strauss's 'Aus Italien' are now brought forward as the unredeemed promises of last winter. The Strauss Symphonic fantasia in four movements may not possess the amazingly audacious characterization of his later works, but the closing Tarantelle section is always extremely popular. Another early work of his comes in January—the Prelude for organ and orchestra. Max Reger is represented by his 'Concerto in the olden style,' written in the Handelian form, for small orchestra and solo violin, but the prospectus is silent on the all-important matter of the solo player. Overtures in the manner of fairy-tales in music come from Hans Pfitzner's 'Christ Elfen,' simple yet telling in its orchestration, and Maurice Ravel's more subtle 'Ma Mère l'Oye.' Gustav von Holst's 'Beni Mora' Suite, when performed with little or no rehearsal at the I.S.M. Conference at Birmingham last January, impressed many competent judges as probably the ablest work at that rather memorable concert. Balling was a member of the audience, and his championship of von Holst by introducing the work into the present Hallé scheme is to be warmly commended. Carl Nielsen, of Danish extraction, is to have his Symphony performed for the first time in England on January 29 next; his work created quite a respectable sensation at the Danish Festival in Stuttgart recently.

The newer Russian music by Scriabine and Stravinsky finds no place in the scheme, but Balakireff's 'Overture sur un thème de marche espagnole,' founded on a Spanish march given to him by Glinka, is said to be a fine specimen of this composer's work. It will be interesting to hear Brodsky in the Elgar Violin concerto, and whilst gladly welcoming Bantock's 'Helena' (H.F.B.) orchestral variations, one cannot but regret that a more representative work such as the 'Dante and Beatrice' or 'Greek Tragedy' overtures has not had the preference. French music is covered by Berlioz's 'Beatrice and Benedict,' the before-mentioned Ravel work, the Rameau-Mottl G minor Concerto, another Roger Ducasse Suite, Saint-Saëns's 'Rouet d'Omphale' and Piano-forte concerto, and Chausson's Poem for violin and orchestra. The Symphonies chosen include that of Goetz in F minor.

The 'Proms.' concerts, given under the auspices of the Manchester Orchestra Ltd., are now feeling the influence of competition, and accordingly enter upon their ninth season conscious of the fact that their claim to have been pioneers in this branch of popular music will not alone suffice. The conductors' duties are to be shared by Balling (who takes half of the series), Bantock, Hamilton Harty, Henri Verbruggen, Arthur Payne, the veteran Simon Speelman taking the first and last concerts of the series. It cannot be said that they bring much new music to Manchester—Rubinstein's 'Feramors' Suite, MacDowell's second Indian Suite, and Bantock's string orchestra work 'In the Far West' and 'Scottish Fantasia' (elaborated during his recent summer holiday at Glencoe) are the only noteworthy items in this category. The solo artists are all old favourites with our Saturday night concert-goers.

For years past Mr. G. W. Brand Lane has been known as our most daring entrepreneur, and his venture into the field of Saturday popular orchestral concerts last winter was watched with mixed feelings by our musical public: Could he last the pace? Would the venture pay? were questions on every lip, for the boldness of his scheme rather took one's breath away, but in the coming season he seems determined to make a bigger 'splash' than ever. His chief asset is undoubtedly the personality of Sir Henry Wood, who is facile princeps in the art of drafting programmes of first-rate, all-round interest. He is to conduct two whole-night Wagner programmes (even in Richter's latter days here we usually got only one such night per season at the Hallé concerts), and when Marchesi comes to sing there will be a considerable extract from 'Tristan.' Strauss is represented by 'Till Eulenspiegel' and the closing scene from 'Salome,' with Aekté as soloist. But setting aside such extra-special attractions as these, what may be called the rank and file items of the programmes show a wonderfully varied interest and cannot be called 'snippetty'—a term fairly applicable to some of last season's programmes. Brand Lane believes in the power of soloists, and whilst the Hallé people display a more numerous array, the newer series brings Marchesi, Mark Hambourg, Egon Petri, John Coates, Gleeson-White, Irene Scharrer, Ruth Vincent, and Ada Crossley. At the time of going to press, each of these series appeared to be booking well.

Many shrewd critics aver that the crucial test of Manchester's vaunted musical culture will be found in the support accorded to the Denhof operatic season—the finest series of operatic master-works ever produced in a like period here.

Upon Thomas Beecham will fall the chief onus of conducting, and although a Lancastrian by birth and upbringing, his native county has had little chance of assessing his worth in this capacity. A conductor could hardly approach a tougher task than will be his during the first month of this provincial tour, until matters have bedded down and run smoothly.

The Harrison concerts, like some of Brand Lane's, will impart something of sensational character to our musical season. Tetrassini and Aino Aekté (appearing within a month of each other) should prove rather a stimulating conjunction, and afford some interesting ground for the comparison of bel canto, ancient and modern styles.

The annual concert of the Manchester Orpheus Choir, on October 15, will serve to freshen one's memory about two such widely-contrasted works as Max Bruch's 'Scenes from the Frithjof Sagas,' and Max Reger's 'An das Meer.'

The Henry Watson Music Library is destined to play a more important rôle in our musical life in the future. Since April last, the Watson custodian, Mr. F. Bentley Nicholson, and his assistants have been busily organizing the catalogues, and by October 8 not only will its resources have been brought more up to date, but printed catalogues are to be available in the departments of part-music, choral music, songs—English and foreign—chamber, organ, and piano-forte music, and the orchestral full score branch is to receive greater attention in the future.

In the realm of chamber music, Manchester and district is richly endowed. The earliest Society—Schiller-Anstalt, it is true, is now defunct, but the Brodsky series, begun about sixteen years since, never with a settled home, has now found sanctuary at the Royal College of Music, and Manchester has at last realised the fact that quartet concerts are a very happy way of spending a winter Saturday afternoon in our murky city. The name of Dayas is greatly revered here in pianistic circles, and December 6 will see the daughter of the famous Manchester teacher in association with her late father's comrades at the College. In February, Brodsky and Siliti—a fine conjunction this—will play Bach.

The Southport chamber concerts (organized and often financed by a Manchester merchant, Mr. Charles Brumm), not satisfied with merely the Sevçik and Parisian Quartets, are taking the full Hallé band to Southport on November 14. The Bowdoin Chamber Concerts Society flourishes on the outskirts of Manchester, and secures variety in the instrumental character of its chamber music by introducing the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society for a choral recital.

During the summer holidays the services at the Cathedral have been sustained by boys' voices alone, and Mr. S. H. Nicholson has written settings of the Responses and of the Litany for four parts of treble voices. Services have also been written and dedicated to the Manchester Cathedral boys by Dr. Luard-Selby, Dr. W. A. C. Cruickshank, and Mr. J. E. Adkins, and Dr. C. H. Lloyd has written an anthem for them entitled 'Whatsoever things written.'

Information respecting other Lancashire musical doings must be held over for the November issue.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union announces four concerts for the ensuing season. On Wednesday, November 26, Dr. Walford Davies will conduct his 'Song of St. Francis,' and Orchestral Suite 'After Wordsworth.' Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' will complete the programme. The choir numbers 350, and the orchestra will be the Scottish. The choral work at the second concert on April 1 will consist of a large selection of unaccompanied choral works ranging from Byrd's five-part motet 'Bow Thine ear,' to part-songs by Delius, Bantock, Parry, and Elgar. The Elizabethan madrigals will be represented by Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Weelkes's 'As Vesta was,' and 'The Nightingale,' Benet's 'Flow, oh my tears,' Morley's 'Fire! Fire!' and 'My bonnie lass,' and Gibbons's 'Silver swan.' The larger choral works include Wesley's 'In exitu Israel,' Bach's 'Sing ye to the Lord,' and Pearsall's 'Sir Patrick Spens.' The annual 'Messiah' performance will take place on Wednesday, December 17, and a special performance of 'Elijah' on February 18. Dr. Coward will conduct, and at the Madrigal concert M. Wassili Safonoff, pianist, and M. Belousoff, violoncellist, will appear.

The Harmonic Society, under Mr. Edgar L. Bainton, will give Handel's 'Judas,' on December 10, and a miscellaneous concert on March 25, the principal choral works being Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer.'

The Chamber Music Society promises six concerts this—its thirty-fourth—season. The Flonzaley, Sevçik, Geloso, and Brussels Quartets provide four of the programmes, M. Wassili-Safonoff and M. Belousoff give a piano-forte and violoncello recital, and M. Alfred Cortot finishes the series with a piano-forte recital. The Society is in the unique position of having more subscribers than it can find accommodation for.

It is with great regret we have to announce the suspension of the Newcastle Philharmonic Orchestral Concerts, owing to lack of financial support. As most of the members are engaged in theatres, the concerts are held in the afternoon. This has prevented many from attending. In the interests of orchestral music it is to be hoped some way out of the difficulty will be found. The Society under Mr. Bainton has done splendid work, and introduced a large number of works to the music-lovers of Tyneside, especially those of the modern British school.

The Darlington Chamber Music Society is now in its ninth season. Five concerts will be given as usual. These are a pianoforte and violin recital by Miss Muriel Herbert and Miss Ellie Sinclair, with Miss Hilda Herbert as vocalist, a concert by the Geloso String Quartet, a pianoforte and violoncello recital by Miss Gröschel and Carl Fuchs, a concert by the Brussels String Quartet, and one by the Manchester Trio. The concerts are worked in connection with Polam Hall School, the girls of which have the advantage of attending all the performances. Works to be given are studied in class beforehand—a practical school of musical appreciation that might be imitated with advantage elsewhere.

Mr. Felix Corbett, at Middlesbrough, continues his series of ballad concerts which last year attained their majority. Three are announced for this season, the principal performers being Madame Tetrzini, Moritz Rosenthal, Sapelnikoff, and Jean Gerardy.

The Tynemouth and Whitley Choral Society is rehearsing 'Elijah' for the first concert on January 21, and for the second, on April 22, Bach's cantata 'To this end appeareth the Son of God,' Cornelius's 'O death,' Balfour Gardiner's 'Stage coach,' madrigals, folk-songs, and a Palestine motet.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The musical season at Nottingham has usually to defer its appearance until the 'festival of the goose' is safely passed; and this year the programme promises an unusually interesting prospect. The Sacred Harmonic Society commence rehearsals on September 22, under Mr. Allen Gill, who begins his twelfth year of work in this city. The works to be immediately put in rehearsal are Elgar's 'King Olaf,' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.'

The Long Eaton Choral Society have in prospect performances of Gounod's 'Faust' on December 16, with Miss Mary Leighton, Mr. Webster Millar, Mr. Bridge Peters, and Mr. Robert Radford as soloists; and on March 17, Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Spohr's 'Last Judgment,' with the solos allotted to Miss Dorothy Silk, Madame Ethel Edgar, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. George Parker. The Orchestral Society at Long Eaton also promise two concerts on November 11, when the 'Egmont' Overture and Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony occupy the post of attraction, whilst the vocal element will be supplied by Miss Mabel Manson and Mr. John Booth. On February 24, at the second concert, Mr. John Dunn will appear as solo violinist, and the Italian Symphony (Mendelssohn), Miniature Suite (Eric Coates), Bantock's String serenade, 'In the Far West,' and Friedemann's Slavonic Rhapsody, make an attractive programme.

The Derby Choral Union give 'The Messiah' at Christmas, Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and Dvorák's 'The spectre's bride'; the latter work will also be put into rehearsal by the Nottingham Glee and Madrigal Society, under the direction of Mr. C. E. Riley. It is a matter for congratulation that we are to have a chamber music concert by Miss Cantelo, as well as a violoncello and pianoforte recital by Mr. Edwin Thorpe and Mr. John Cullen. Mr. Allen Gill will also give three lectures on the 'Development of the string quartet' at University College on October 23, 30, and November 13.

Nottingham will enjoy the opportunity of hearing some of the foremost artists of the day at Messrs. Wilson, Pick & Co.'s subscription concerts, where Melsa, Pachmann, Rachmaninoff, Elena Gerhardt, and the Queen's Hall Orchestra (under Sir Henry Wood) are sure to prove attractive.

The Harvest Festival season will be almost completed when these notes are published. Haydn's 'Creation' was chosen for performance on September 28 by the Wesley Chapel Choir at Broad Street, under Mr. Marshall Ward; Tozer's 'Two Harvests,' by the Castlegate Choir, under Mr. F. W. Christall, on the same date; and Gaul's 'Holy City' on September 21 at Halifax Place Mission, under Mr. E. M. Barber.

Special services were held on September 7 in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Forest Road. In the afternoon a sacred programme was given by Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. Herbert Smith, and Mr. William Downing. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson gave on the organ Hollins's Concert overture in C and Dicks's 'O worship the King.'

The Retford Amateur Musical Society, of which Mr. John Smith is the conductor, have decided to give a performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' in December.

For his organ recital on September 21, the 250th since holding his present post at Halifax Place, Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson selected the following works by Nottingham musicians: 'Grand Chœur' (L. Henniker), 'A Morning Song' (Bernard Johnson), 'Introduction and Allegro' (Blyton Dobson), 'Das Wiederkommen' (E. M. Barber), and 'Pastorale' (F. Wyatt).

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The chorus sub-committee of the Sheffield Musical Festival have been busy for some weeks organizing the choir for the next Festival to be held November 11, 12, and 13, 1914. A choir of 350 is to be formed, and already a large number of applicants have been tested. It is stated that the standard of vocal quality is superior to that at any previous Festival, an indication that the choral habit shows no falling off in and around Sheffield. Every applicant is tested for voice, vocalisation, and diction, and has to sing at sight time-tests and melodies specially written by Dr. McNaught.

Judging by the prospectuses of the musical bodies in the city and district, a season of exceptional activity is to be anticipated.

The Sheffield Amateur Musical Society, which was founded in 1864, will give its hundredth concert on December 16. The Society, which has Sir Henry Wood and Mr. J. A. Rodgers as joint-conductors, and Mr. J. W. Phillips as organist, is maintained entirely by subscription. 'The Dream of Gerontius,' which Sir Henry has never conducted at Sheffield, will be performed, with Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Herbert Heyner as soloists. Brahms's Alto Rhapsody will also be given.

The Musical Union, conducted by Dr. Coward, put forward a strong programme. Bach's Mass in B minor will be given for the first time by the Society, and the list also includes Elgar's 'The Music Makers' and Parry's 'Job.'

The Sheffield Choral Union will perform Hofmann's opera 'Cinderella' and Haydn's 'The Seasons,' under Lieut. S. Suckley's direction.

The Sheffield Promenade Concerts have reached their fifth season. Four concerts will be given, with a professional orchestra of sixty, conducted by Mr. J. A. Rodgers. Three Symphonies (Tchaikovsky's No. 6, Beethoven's No. 3, and Schubert's B minor), and four Concertos figure in the scheme. The soloists include Miss Ivonne Astor, Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, Miss Ariol Jones, and Mr. Cecil Baumer.

A series of six chamber concerts and recitals have been organized by Miss Foxon, who in past years did much to establish high-class concerts in the city. Among the performers are the Rosé and Flonzaley Quartets, Miss Elena Gerhardt, Miss Fanny Davies, and Mr. Percy Grainger.

The Sheffield Subscription Concerts cover six evenings, and at the head of a list of exceptional attractiveness are orchestral concerts by the Hallé and Queen's Hall Orchestras, with Mr. Balling and Sir Henry Wood, respectively, in command.

Among the musical arrangements in the district may be named coming concerts by the Chesterfield Musical Union ('A tale of Old Japan' and 'Wedding of Shon Maclean'—Mr. J. F. Staton, conductor), the Doncaster Musical Society ('Elijah,' 'Spectre's bride,' and 'Flag of England'—Mr. Wilfred Sanderson, conductor), and Rotherham Choral Society (Brahms's 'Requiem'—Mr. T. Brarnell, conductor).

The Denhof Opera Company will visit Sheffield during the autumn, producing for the first time in the city 'Elektra,' 'The Rose-bearer,' and 'The Mastersingers.'

Mr. Arthur Broadley, who has for some years been known to the public as a violoncellist, has been appointed conductor of the Dewsbury Permanent Orchestra.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

CHRISTCHURCH (N.Z.).—Beethoven's first Symphony, chosen as the principal number in the Musical Society's programme on July 28, was performed with creditable efficiency under the direction of Mr. Alfred Worsley. Great enthusiasm was aroused by the trio playing of Master Harry Ellwood (violin), Master George Ellwood (violinello), and Miss Ellwood (pianoforte). Songs were given effectively by Miss Claris Holgate.

FERNDALE (RHONDDA).—For the first time in the history of the Ferndale Workman's Hall there has been a visit from an opera company. The Turner English Opera Company came, and created great enthusiasm in the locality. The operas performed were Wallace's 'Maritana,' Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' Donizetti's 'Daughter of the Regiment,' Verdi's 'Il Trovatore,' Gounod's 'Faust,' Mozart's 'Don Giovanni,' and Balfe's 'Bohemian Girl.' The works were well performed, and another visit is looked forward to.

HANLEY.—The autumn programme of the North Staffordshire District Choral Society, of which Mr. G. H. Woodall is conductor, has been issued. At a miscellaneous concert on October 16 the choir will contribute madrigals and part-songs, and eminent artists will take part. 'The Messiah' will be given on November 27.

HARROGATE.—At the symphony concert given on August 27 by the Municipal Orchestra at the Kursaal, under Mr. Julian Clifford, Sir Alexander Mackenzie was present to conduct his Scottish Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in which Mr. Arthur Cooke was the soloist, and his 'Britannia' Overture. A fine reception was accorded to the distinguished musician. The programme also included Beethoven's seventh Symphony. Other composers who have recently conducted their works at these concerts are Dr. H. J. Edwards, Mr. F. H. Bond, and Mr. A. M. Goodhart.

IPSWICH.—For the annual concert of the Ipswich Male-voice Choir, which is to take place on February 4, an excellent programme of part-songs has been chosen. It includes Elgar's 'The Reveille' and Hegar's 'The Phantom Host.' A sacred concert will be given on Good Friday, and other concerts are in view. Mr. J. Job is the honorary conductor.

JOHANNESBURG.—An 'Evening with Handel,' arranged by Mr. W. Deane, the well-known organist of St. Mary's Church, was given in St. Mary's on Wednesday, April 23. Mr. Deane's organ solos included 'Fixed in His everlasting seat' ('Samson'), the Adagio and March from the Occasional Oratorio, besides several other pieces. Miss Selma Sacke played the Violin sonata in E major; Mrs. Deane, as pianist, was heard in the Suites Nos. 6 and 7, and in the Variations in E from Suite No. 5; Mr. William Llewellyn sang 'Arm, arm, ye brave' ('Judas Maccabæus') and 'How willing my paternal love' ('Samson'). The 'Largo' was given as a trio, arranged for violin, pianoforte, and organ. The music was greatly appreciated.—Mrs. Deane was solo-pianist at the Musical Society's concert on April 9, when she played with much success.

PERTH (W.A.).—The fortieth concert of the Metropolitan Liedertafel brought an exceptionally large audience to His Majesty's Theatre, on July 19. Mr. A. J. Leckie, under whose guidance the choir have continued their advance in standard and increase in numbers, conducted an excellent miscellaneous programme in which Dudley Buck's 'Hark, the trumpet calls,' MacDowell's 'Cradle song,' Julius Harrison's 'The Vikings,' a 'Dirge,' by Cornelius, and two of Elgar's 'From the Greek Anthology' settings served to display the high and varied powers of the choir. The artists who assisted were Miss Rena Sara (vocalist), Mr. Reginald Brown, Mr. Leckie, and Miss Gladys Orchard (pianists); and a string quartet who played Percy Grainger's 'Molly on the shore.'

SHEFFIELD.—The eleventh concert of the Singing Class conducted at Holy Trinity Church, Wicker, by Mr. John Farr, took place with success on September 20. Pearsall's 'Sing we and chant it,' Cowen's 'Bridal chorus' ('The Rose-maiden'), Hatton's 'When evening twilight,' and other choral numbers were given. Mr. Farr contributed a bassoon solo by Holbrooke, and several vocalists assisted.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The following resolution was adopted at the committee meeting held on August 27: 'Having regard to the fact that there is no public hall in the town suitable for the class of concert usually given by the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society, the committee is reluctantly compelled to suspend the Society's operations for the coming season, or until suitable accommodation is available.' The cause of this regrettable lack of accommodation for musical activity on a large scale is the recent sale of the Agricultural Hall. The Society is in its forty-fifth year.

Foreign Notes.

AACHEN.

Gustav Mahler's stupendous eighth Symphony, called 'The Symphony of the thousand,' for soli, two choirs, orchestra, and organ, will be given on October 5, in the great Kurhaus-Saal, under the direction of Musikdirektor Fritz Busch. The public rehearsal will take place on October 4, at 7 p.m. The soloists are: Gertrude Foerstel, Tilly Cahnbley-Hinken, Emma Lindenberg, Maria Philippi, Else Pfaff, Carl Aagaard Ostvig, Georg Nieratzky, Willy Fenten, Kapellmeister F. Dietrich (violin solo), Edward Stahlhuth (organ). The choir required for the singing of the 'Veni Creator Spiritus' (in the first part of the Symphony) and the final scene of Goethe's 'Faust' (2nd part) (in the second part of the Symphony) comprises a force of 560 singers, and includes the Gürzenich-Konzertchor, Cologne, and the Städtischer Gesangverein and Kinder-Chor, Aachen. The Town Orchestra has been increased for this event to 130 players. The performance will take about two hours.

BAD NAUHEIM.

At the fifth symphony concert (Winderstein Orchestra) the overture 'Urvasi,' by Ferd. Neisser, was played and met with great success.—Hans F. Schaub's latest work, 'Three Intermezzi,' for small orchestra, was given for the first time at the seventh symphony concert, and was very cordially received.

BADEN—BADEN.

The following operettas have recently been performed for the first time at the Stadt-Theater—'Suppchen,' by Gilbert; 'Der Frauen-Fresser,' by Edmund Eysler.

BAYREUTH.

During the summer of 1914, the following works will be performed at the Festspielhaus: 'Parsifal,' 'The Ring,' 'The Flying Dutchman.' Alternately with these works a series of Gluck's operas will be given at the Town Theatre.

BERLIN.

On 'The solemn day of prayer and repentance' (Busstag) Felix Nowowiejski's celebrated oratorio 'Quo Vadis' will be given here for the first time.—During the coming season, under the direction of Kapellmeister E. von Wynański, the Philharmonic Orchestra will give three concerts of works by Slavonic composers.—The first 'Exclusive concert' at the New Yellow Marble Hall (Hôtel Esplanade) was announced for September 20, at 9 p.m., under the auspices of the Konzertbureau-Gutmann.—'Ein Heerführer der Menschheit' (A Leader of the world) is the title of a new Symphonic-poem for orchestra by Kurt Hennig, which will be produced during the next season at Berlin. This work will also be performed during the coming season at Mainz and at Wiesbaden.—

Herr Humperdinck is engaged with the orchestration of his new work for the theatre, the libretto of which is by Robert Misch. General Blucher (the Marshal Vorwärts) will be a prominent figure in this work. The production will take place before 1914.—A new opera, 'The wedding of the Sobiebe,' after Hugo von Hofmannsthal's famous play, has been written by the composer Riccardo Storti.—Karl Kämpf's new work, 'Nature and life' (male-voice and orchestra) will be produced during the coming season by the Berliner Liederkrantz.—The 'Oriental dance' from the opera 'Zuleima,' by the eighteen-years old composer, Heinrich Binstock, will be performed by the Philharmonic Orchestra.—The Russo-German composer Paul Juon has written the incidental music to Karl Hauptmann's fairy-drama, 'Die Armseeligen Besenbinder' (The unhappy broom-makers).—Franz Lehar's new operetta 'Die ideale Gattin' (The ideal wife) will be produced here by the impresario Monti.

BOSTON.

In February, 1914, the Opera will produce Riccardo Zandonai's 'Francesca da Rimini,' the libretto of which is based on Gabriele d'Annunzio's poem.

BRESLAU.

A successful performance of Monteverde's opera 'Orfeo' (produced at Mantua in 1608) has been given recently in a condensed form at the Town Theatre. Moussorgsky's opera 'Boris Godounov' and Boieldieu's 'Les Voitures versées' (opéra-comique, produced at Paris, 1820) will be performed for the first time during the coming season.—Wagner's 'Parsifal' is planned for January 1, 1914. The Town Council have given the sum of M. 30,000 towards the expenses of the 'Parsifal' performances.—The third Symphony by Waldemar von Bausnern will be heard under the direction of Prof. Dr. Dohrn.

BRUSSELS.

The recently-discovered Suite for the Luth, composed by J. S. Bach, dates, according to M. A. Tirabassi (the lucky finder), from 1720. In that year Bach was living at Köthen.

CETTE.

Massenet's 'Don Quichotte,' given recently for the first time here, proved a phenomenal success.

CHEMNITZ.

Paul Linke, the famous valse and operetta composer, has just finished a new work in three acts—'Casanova'—which will be produced at the Town Theatre during this month.

CHICAGO.

'Samson et Dalila' and 'Déjanire' (Saint-Saëns), 'Fervaa!' (Vincent d'Indy), and 'Felleas and Melisande' (Claude Debussy), are included in the works which will be given during the coming season at the Grand Opera, under the direction of Signor Campanini.—The works chosen for performance by the Apollo Musical Club are 'The Creation,' 'Elijah,' 'The Messiah,' Elgar's 'The Music makers,' Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' and Bach's Mass in B minor.

COLOGNE.

The Kölner-Männergesangverein were awarded the gold medal of the Ghent Exhibition.—The Musico-historic Museum, founded by Wilhelm Heyer, will shortly be opened to the public. The museum includes the Heyer collection, the Museum Kraus of Florence, the Ibach-Sammlung and the famous second collection of old musical instruments of Paul de Witt, Leipsic. Paul de Witt's first collection forms the principal part of the Museum of the Hochschule für Musik at Berlin.

COPENHAGEN.

August Enna's new opera 'Gloria Arsena' (the libretto based on an episode of the French Revolution, after Alexander Dumas, by Olaf Hansen) will be produced during the coming season.

FRANKFORT.

Among the works to be produced by the Opernhaus during the coming season are 'Porzia,' by Otto Taubmann, and the ballet 'Der Zwerg und die Infantin,' by Bernhard Sekles.—Verdi's 'Don Carlos' and 'Falstaff' will be performed for the first time.—Reference to the Grétry Exhibition is made on p. 652.

DEAUVILLE.

A new fairy ballet, 'Narkiss,' by Jean Nougues, was performed recently for the first time at the Théâtre du Casino, under the direction of M. Mason. The work met with a great success.

GHENT.

The very interesting Saint-Saëns Festival, recently given at the Exhibition, included performances of the Overture to 'Les Barbares,' produced at Paris, 1901, the Symphonic-poem 'La jeunesse d'Hercule,' Op. 50 (composed 1877), the Symphony in A minor, Op. 55 (composed 1859), 'Africa' Fantasia in G minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 89 (composed and published 1891), and the Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 5, in F, Op. 103, the pianoforte part admirably played by the illustrious composer.—The Festival de Musique Wallonne proved very attractive. The programme included 'Macbeth,' Symphonic-poem by Sylvain Dupuis, 'Fantaisie sur deux Noëls Wallons,' by J. Jongen, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in E flat by Théo. Ysaye (the solo part played by the composer), and various songs by Marvet, Hendret, Vreuls, and Delune.

GRAUFA (NEAR PILLNITZ).

A sensation is caused in this year, the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Wagner, by the sale of the famous composer's 'Lohengrin Haus,' where in 1846 the world-renowned opera was composed. This celebrated 'Haus,' which became a small Wagnerian museum, was sold to a wealthy Berlin butcher for the sum of M. 48,000.

HALLE.

The oratorio 'Das Stühnopfer des neuen Bundes' (The peace offering), by Dr. Carl Löwe (1796-1869), well-known for his achievements in the ballad-form for solo voice and pianoforte, was recently successfully revived by the Franksche Choral Society.

HAMBURG.

The Neue Oper Hamburg was successfully inaugurated on August 29 by a very fine performance of Mozart's immortal 'Figaro,' under the direction of Hofkapellmeister Dr. Georg Göhler.—The first performance here of Kienzl's 'Der Kuhreigen' (The Swiss shepherd's call) took place on August 30. The work was received with great enthusiasm.—'Daniel in der Löwengrube' (an opera burlesque), by Amelie Nikisch (the wife of the celebrated conductor), will be produced during the coming season.

HANOVER.

'Schützenmanöver,' a new operetta by Walter W. Goetze, will be produced shortly at the Town Theatre.—In commemoration of the Verdi centenary the Court Theater will perform a series of his operas.—Wagner's 'Parsifal' is planned for Holy Week.

HELLERAU-DRESDEN.

It is stated that the famous Jaques-Dalcroze College for the study of music and rhythm will be converted into a limited company. The distinguished founder, Mr. Jaques-Dalcroze, will remain the artistic director of the institution.

HIELSINGFORS.

Among the works to be performed by the Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Georg Schneevogt during the coming season are the following: 'Bruckner's Symphony No. 8, Mahler's Symphony No. 5, Selection from Strauss's 'Ariadne,' Weingartner's 'Lustige Overture,' Palmgren's Pianoforte concerto in C sharp minor and Prelude to the opera 'Nimmisutariit,' Melartini's Violin concerto and 'Ancient fairy-tales' Suite for orchestra, and last but not least, Sir Edward Elgar's new Symphonic-study, 'Falstaff.'

KIEL.

At the United Theatres, under the direction of M. Karl Aloing, the following works will be given during the forthcoming season: 'The Meistersingers,' 'Parsifal' (Wagner), 'Beatrice and Benedict,' edited by Kleefeld and Stransky (Berlioz); 'Die verschenkte Frau' (D'Albert); 'Oberon' (Weber); 'Königskinder' (Humperdinck); 'Cosi fan tutte' (Mozart); 'Masaniello' (Auber); 'Hans Heiling' (Marschner); 'Manon' (Massenet); 'La Bohème' (Puccini).

LEIPSIK.

A performance of A. Schönberg's 'Gurrelieder,' under the direction of the composer, is to be given at the Alberthalle at the beginning of March, 1914. For this venture the Winderstein Orchestra will be considerably increased. The Leipziger-Männerchor, the Leipziger-Singakademie, and prominent soloists have been selected for the vocal part of the work.—The coming concert season looks very promising. Herr A. Nikisch intends to perform, in a series of six concerts, all Brahms's orchestral works.—New works by Kaun, Reger, and Prochaska are proposed for the first concert of the Bach-Verein, under the direction of Herr Straube.—Wolf-Ferrari's 'La vita nuova,' and Wolfram's 'Weihnachts Mysterium,' have been selected for performance by Dr. Stephani.—'Handerl,' the new operetta by Josef Snaga, will be produced during the coming season at the Town Theatre.—The new works to be performed for the first time by the Winderstein Orchestra (Philharmonic Concerts) include: 'Zu einem Drama' (overture) and Violin concerto in F, by F. Gernsheim; Fantasia for orchestra and organ, by R. Stöhr; 'Per aspera ad astra' Symphony in D minor, by Aug. Scharer; 'Lebensfreude' Overture, by G. Schumann; 'Tragische' Overture, by E. Boehe; 'Allotria' Overture, by C. Rorich; 'Three Intermezzi' for small orchestra, by Hans Schaub; 'Fragment from Kätchen von Heilbronn,' by Hans Pätzner.

LEMBERG (GALICIA).

A series of very interesting symphony concerts was given by the Galizische-Musikverein, under the conductorship of Director M. Soltys. The programmes included Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92; Claude Debussy's Nocturnes; Glazounow's Violin concerto (soloist, Tadeus Szulc); Rachmaninoff's Pianoforte concerto No. 3, in D minor, Op. 30 (soloist, Ed. Steinberger); a Symphonic-poem by Karłowicz; and the Prize Symphony by Wladislaw Zelenski, the well-known Polish composer and director of the Cracow Conservatory.—F. Nowowiejski's celebrated oratorio 'Quo Vadis' was given twice and obtained a great success. The solo part (St. Peter) was sung by Franz Steiner.—The Lutnia Choral Society gave a much appreciated performance of Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride,' under the direction of Stephan Cetwinski.

MAINZ.

The Evangelische Gesangverein gave recently a fine performance of Dr. Karl Loewe's oratorio 'Hiob.' The work was very much appreciated. 'Hiob' is considered by the connoisseurs as the very best of Loewe's oratorios.—Leoncavallo's opera 'Zigeuner' will be given here during the coming season. This will be the first performance of the work in Germany.

MILAN.

In November several festival concerts will be given in connection with the fifteen-hundredth anniversary of the famous decree of the Emperor Constantine I. (the Great). Among the works to be performed are: 'Vespertina Oratorio,' 'Suite for orchestra' and 'Pastorale,' by Perosi. 'The Last Judgment,' by the same composer, will probably be given at these concerts. The festival performances in connection with the celebration of the Verdi Centenary will commence on October 1, and will include: 'Nabucco,' 'Aida,' 'Otello,' 'Falstaff,' and the 'Requiem.' The best Italian singers—with the exception of Signor Caruso—will co-operate.

MONTE CARLO.

It is proposed to produce during the coming season Massenet's posthumous opera, 'Amadis,' at the Théâtre du Casino. It is well known that Massenet favoured this famous theatre for the production of his later works.

MOSCOW.

Emil Kuper, conductor of the Imperial Opera, intends to give during the coming season a performance of Sir Edward Elgar's new Symphonic-study, 'Falstaff.'

NICE.

The works to be given during next season at the Opera include: 'Javotte,' 'Phryné,' 'Samson et Dalila,' by Saint-Saëns, 'L'Enfant prodigue,' by Debussy, 'La Péri,' by Paul Dukas, and 'La Tragédie de Salomé,' by Florent Schmitt.

NEW YORK.

In February, 1914, Gustave Charpentier's opera 'Julien' will be given for the first time at the Metropolitan Opera House, with Mlle. Farrar, Signor Caruso, and M. Dinh Gilly, under the direction of Signor Arturo Toscanini. The composer will be present at the performance.

OLDENBURG.

The Court Orchestra will produce shortly a new orchestral work, 'Die Nymphen' (Introduction and Rondo), by Hermann Bischoff.

PARIS.

'The Operetta of the Ten' is the title of a work which, it is said, will be produced next season at one of the Théâtres des Variétés. The ten composers who will participate in this collaboration are: Saint-Saëns, Xavier Leroux, André Messager, Camille Erlanger, Reynaldo Hahn, Charles Lecocq, Cuvillier, Hirschmann, Rodolphe Berger, and Willy Redstone. Each of them will be responsible for two numbers (indeed a regular French mixture).—It is stated that the late French Minister, Emile Olivier (the husband of Blandine d'Agoult, a daughter of Franz Liszt), left numerous hitherto unpublished letters of Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner, and Cosima Wagner.—The last concert of the Société de Bach included four chorals by J. S. Bach, and an a cappella chorus by Jannequin, 'The battle of Marignan.' The soloist was Paderewski, who gave a very fine interpretation of Bach's Chromatic fantasia and fugue.

—At the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, under the direction of M. Gabriel Astruc, the following works will be given during the coming season: 'Eros Vainqueur' (Pierre de Bréville), 'Le Chant de la Cloche' (Vincent d'Indy), 'Khamma' (Debussy), 'Pénélope' (Gabriel Fauré), 'Boris Godounov' (Moussorgsky), 'Le Chevalier à la rose' and 'Elektra' (Richard Strauss), 'Manon Lescaut' (Puccini), 'La vie breve' (Manuel de Falla), 'Le Secret de Suzanne' (Wolf-Ferrari), 'Le Tableau parlant' (Grétry), 'La Péri' (Paul Dukas), 'Nocturnes' (Debussy), 'Cain et Abel' (Felix Weingartner), 'Freischütz' (Weber), 'L'Elisir d'Amore,' 'Don Pasquale,' 'Lucia di Lammermoor' (Donizetti), 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia' (Rossini), 'Rigoletto' and 'Traviata' (Verdi), 'La Serva Padrona' (Pergolesi), 'Parsifal' (cast and scenery from Bayreuth) (Wagner).—'Cléopâtre,' a posthumous opera by Massenet (libretto by Henri Cain and Louis Sayer), will be produced during the coming season at the Grand-Opéra. In connection with the 'Mireille' celebrations at St. Rémy-en-Provence, a fine performance of this opera was given at the Opéra Comique.—M. Charles Marie Widor, the celebrated organist and composer, has just finished the score of a new opera, 'Nerto' (libretto by Frédéric Mistral, of 'Mireille' fame). The work will be produced during the coming season.

PARMA.

At the Theater Del Regio, the following works by Verdi will be given in honour of the hundredth anniversary of the composer's birth: 'Oberto, Conte di San Bonifacio,' Verdi's first opera, produced at La Scala, Milan, November, 18, 1839, (Verdi's publisher, Ricordi, bought the full score for 1,750 francs); 'The four seasons,' ballet from 'Les Vêpres Siciliennes,' produced at the Grand Opéra, Paris, June 13, 1855; 'Nabucodonosor,' Verdi's first success, produced at La Scala, Milan, March 9, 1842; 'Un ballo in Maschera,' produced at the Theater Apollo, Rome, 1859; 'Aida,' produced at the Theatre Italien, Cairo, December 24, 1871; (the Khedive Ismail Pacha paid the composer 100,000 francs); 'Don Carlos,' produced at the Grand Opéra, Paris, March 11, 1867; 'Falstaff,' produced at La Scala, Milan, February 9, 1893; 'Rigoletto,' produced at the Theater Fenice, Venice, March 11, 1851; 'Messa da Requiem,' produced at the Chiesa di San Marco, Milan, May 22, 1874. It is stated that Signor Campanini, director of the Chicago Opera House, will defray all expenses—a remarkable enthusiasm!

ST. PETERSBURG.

During last season Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, gave about twenty concerts, the receipts amounting to no less than £15,200.—'Parsifal' will be performed during the coming season, the ecclesiastical censors having removed their interdiction. The first performance of Sir Edward Elgar's 'Falstaff' will take place under the direction of Alexander Siloti.

SAINT-RÉMY-DE-PROVENCE.

The inauguration of the monument to Charles Gounod took place on September 6, under the presidency of M. Bérard (Under-Secretary of State for the Fine Arts), and was witnessed by a large concourse. It is well known that Gounod composed 'Mireille' at Saint-Rémy, and it is to commemorate this fact that the statue has been erected. On the same day at noon a commemorative plate was unveiled on the house where Gounod stayed at Saint-Rémy. On Sunday, September 7, a magnificent performance of 'Mireille' was given (in the open air) in the valley of Saint-Clair, with the co-operation of eminent artists.

SCHEVENINGEN.

The overture to 'Gwendoline' (Chabrier), the 'Suite Algérienne' (Saint-Saëns), 'Dans les Steppes de l'Asie Centrale' (Borodine), and Norwegian Dances (Grieg), along with melodies by Debussy and Brahms, were included in the programme of a concert recently given by the Lamoureux Concert Association, under the conductorship of M. Catherine.

STUTTGART.

During the coming season the Court Theatre will produce 'Uhlen Spiegel,' by Braunsfels, and 'Ferdinand and Louise,' by Julius Zaichke. The following works will be given for the first time at the same Theatre: 'Oberst Chabert' (Waltershausen), 'Kubreigen' (Kienzl), and 'Barberine (Neitzel).

VIENNA.

On October 19 the new 'Konzerthaus' will be inaugurated by a concert given under the direction of the famous conductor, Ferdinand Loewe. Richard Strauss's new work, 'Festliches Prælium,' Op. 61, for orchestra and organ, will be produced on this occasion—certainly the most salient feature of the programme. The same work will be given for the first time during the coming season at Leipsic and at Berlin by the distinguished Kapellmeister, A. Nikisch.

WIESBADEN.

Fritz Vollbach's new work for male chorus and orchestra, 'Koenig Laurin's Rosengarten,' will be produced on November 19, under the direction of Prof. Mannstädt. Other performances of this work will be given at the following towns: Frankfurt, Vienna, Königsberg, Leipsic, Dresden, St. Gallen, Zürich.

ZWICKAU.

The recently-discovered unpublished manuscript of a treatise on 'Counterpoint and fugue,' by Robert Schumann (written 1847-48), has been presented to the Schumann Museum.

In consequence of Mr. Douglas Redman's absence in Australia the Brixton Oratorio Choir will not meet during the coming season.

Miscellaneous.

The programmes of the concerts given on Cromer Pier by the Ashton Royal Italian Orchestra, under Signor Calamini, give attention to English orchestral composers. Amongst the items performed at recent concerts we note Gavotte in G (A. von Ahn Carse), 'Minuet d'Amour' (Cowen), 'Four characteristic waltzes' (S. Coleridge-Taylor), Serenade from 'The wand of youth' (Elgar), and Second Entr'acte from 'Nero' (S. Coleridge-Taylor).

The music chosen for performance during the season by the Harringay Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Harry E. King, includes Beethoven's fifth Symphony, Cowen's 'English dances,' Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, Mendelssohn's fourth Symphony, Schubert's eighth Symphony, Mackenzie's 'Scottish Rhapsody,' and Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite.

Sir George Martin, C.V.O., entered his seventieth year on September 11. We are glad to say that he is still active. May he live long to adorn his profession! A portrait and a full sketch of his career were given in our issue for March, 1907.

On Sunday, September 7, Mr. W. L. Biggs gave a lecture at the East Oxford P.S.A. on Bible music compared with modern music. A number of musical examples, interpreted by able artists, illustrated his remarks. A large audience showed great appreciation.

An effort to which we wish immediate success, is being made to re-establish the Epping and District Orchestral Society. Ladies and gentlemen wishing to join are invited to send their names to the Editor of the Gazette, Epping, or to Mr. Albert J. Graves, The Grammar School, Ongar.

The Guildford Choral Society (conductor, Mr. Archibald Hollier) have arranged to give concerts on December 11 and April 2, the works chosen being Spohr's 'Last Judgment' and Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius.'

A lecture on English Folk-song will be given by Dr. R. Vaughan Williams at the Central Buildings, Westminster, on October 3, at 8 p.m. Mr. J. Campbell McInnes will assist with vocal illustrations.

Mr. Alfred E. Whitehead has been appointed professor of the organ, harmony, counterpoint, &c., at Mount Allison University, Sackville, N.B., Canada, and also organist and choirmaster at the Methodist Church, Sackville.

The six 'Biblical songs' of Dvorák that were referred to in our last issue (p. 597) as having been played on the organ by Mr. F. G. Bradford, were sung by Mr. W. Fothergill Robinson.

Mr. Frank Bridge and Mr. Julius Harrison are conductor and master of music to Mr. Raymond Roze's opera season at Covent Garden, which opens on November 1.

On October 21 Mr. Charles Fry will give an evening of musical recitations at Steinway Hall.

Mr. William Wallace has resigned the position of secretary to the Royal Philharmonic Society.

Answers to Correspondents.

M.M.—You ask us 'Why the greatest musicians, such as Bauer, Pachmann, Godowsky, Paderewski, &c., have no letters to their names.' If your question refers to prefixes, their being dropped is supposed to show great distinction. If, however, you refer to affixes, we expect it is because they have not passed the necessary examinations. We are unable to say whether they went in and failed. 'Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.'

H. L. C. wishes to obtain a copy of a Trio for men's voices, opening with the words, 'Golden stars their trust are keeping.' He heard it on a seaside pier eight or nine years ago.

T. C.—Illustrated articles on Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford Cathedrals were given in our issues for July, 1905, November, 1905, and March, 1906, respectively.

L. B.—Cummings's 'The rudiments of music' (1s.), Stainer's 'Harmony' (2s.), and Bridge's 'Counterpoint' (2s.), in Novello's Primer Series, would suit your purpose.

BRINSMEAD PIANOS

KENTFORD, SUFFOLK,

10. 3. 13.

Messrs. BRINSMEAD & SONS,

Dear Sirs,—May I convey to you my sincere appreciation of your fine pianos. I have used them at the bulk of my concerts, and the instruments played on at the three of my concerts this year have been even better in tone and singing quality than any I have had before. That any one in England should have an idea that English Pianos are not superior in durability, power, and workmanship passes my comprehension. I wish you all continued success in the manufacture of a first-class instrument. Perhaps the most remarkable quality of your pianos is the freedom of touch.

Most sincerely yours,

(Signed) JOSEF HOLBROOKE.

A NEW EDITION

WITH LARGER MARGINS AND IMPROVED INDEX

ANTHEMS ANCIENT AND MODERN

Which contains 134 of the finest Anthems of the world, providing for every season of the Christian year and every occasion of the Church's life.

The Church Times says: "Great care has been taken in selecting from among the works of well-known composers, those which have stood the test of frequent use and are of recognised standard excellence, while the new compositions are of such merit as to warrant the belief that they will win a wide acceptance. We wish for this admirable collection the cordial reception it deserves."

The Birmingham Gazette says: "Should prove a boon and a blessing to the Church throughout the world. Surely there never was such a book in such compass. There can be no doubt as to the brilliant future awaiting this most surprising book."

The Guardian says: "The collection as a whole is admirable."

The Musical Journal regards it as epoch-making in the matter of providing congregations with good anthems at the lowest possible cost. "Think of it—a hundred and thirty-four anthems for three shillings. The collection deserves a hearty welcome."

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "An excellent collection, convenient in form, clear in setting both of music and letterpress, contributed to by composers of justly merited fame. We are assured it will meet a real need, and consequently receive a hearty welcome alike from clergy, choirmasters, choirs and congregations."

The Westminster Gazette says: "It is not surprising that the volume enjoys wide popularity."

Cloth boards, white edges	...	...	3s. od. net.	Words only, cloth boards, large type	...	...	1s. od. net.
Cloth boards, gold lettered, red edges	...	...	3s. 6d. "	Cloth boards, small type	...	...	os. 6d. "

Tonic Sol-fa Editions at same price.

FERRIS TOZER, Mus. Doc., of Exeter, says: "A splendid collection, and specially for the price, it is wonderful."

The ARCHDEACON OF OTTAWA says: "I am very much pleased with 'Anthems Ancient and Modern.'"

A specimen copy will be sent at half-price to any Clergyman, Minister, Organist, or Choirmaster on application to The Editor of Anthems Ancient and Modern, Ealing, London, W.

OFFICE OF HOLY COMMUNION IN G, FOR MEN'S VOICES.

"Dr. Bunnett's admirable little service supplies a want which has often been felt. It is the work of a devout English Churchman, whose musical experience is ripe with the maturity of many years spent in the service of the sanctuary. It is, moreover, complete, containing as it does all the musical requirements of the present Prayer Book; we venture to hope that it may find a wide acceptance in choirs and places where they sing the Divine Office in the absence of boy-choristers."—Organist and Choirmaster.

A SECOND SET OF 12 SHORT PIECES FOR THE ORGAN.

"These delightful little compositions will be gladly welcomed by teachers requiring easy pieces for beginners suitable for performance in church as voluntaries. We heartily recommend them. Introduction, Air with Variations, and Finale Fugato for organ. The Norwich Organist, if he has somewhat copied the title of a well-known organ piece by H. Smart, has most certainly steered remarkably clear of that piece in both conception and development of his theme—the Aria (B flat) might easily pass for one bearing the name of Joseph Haydn, so charmingly beautiful is it. The Fugue shows some clever and musicianly treatment of the Air."—Organist and Choirmaster.

A MANUAL OF PLAINSONG

FOR DIVINE SERVICE

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED THE PSALTER NOTED

TO GREGORIAN TONES

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainsong, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainsong. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainsong during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Tè Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

The Canticles noted to Gregorian Tones, together with the Litany and Responses from the above. 1s. Net.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

THE TIMES.

Congregational singing of the Psalms is difficult to accomplish; the rhythm is neither that of bars nor of musical phrase, but of the literary accent of the verse. The Barless Psalter has been framed with this in view, rejecting as false the idea that an Anglican chant sets the Psalms partly to free recitation and partly to a strict musical measure. Practically it revises Anglican chanting upon the basis of plainsong chanting, holding that the value of the notes must be considered as relative to the value of the syllables. Very few markings, therefore, are required to show the relation between the words and the music, and any one may quickly master its principles without technical knowledge. From that point of view it should help congregations to join intelligently in Psalms and Canticles.

THE MORNING POST.

In the matter of Church Music there is a notable issue in the form of a "Barless Psalter." The system is simple and the marking clear.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The Barless Psalter is likely to prove a boon to those interested in congregational singing of the Psalms in church, and anxious to improve it. The congregational singing in our Anglican churches is not a feature to be proud of, and a careful study of this capital little book may lead to a better state of affairs. The detailed instructions are comprehensive and simple.

THE GUARDIAN.

The Anglican Church has had to pay heavily during some two centuries or more for the hard and mechanical treatment of Psalms and Canticles brought about by the introduction of the barred music of Anglican Chants. . . . In place of the older and more flexible rhythm of unbarred plainsong. The result was . . . to destroy congregational singing . . . and to murder the magnificent prose rhythms of the Psalter. . . . It has been demonstrated that the Anglican Chant can be adequately handled by subordinating the musical accent strictly to the words, and by the selection of appropriate chants. . . . Mr. Marshall . . . makes a more practical suggestion in eliminating the bars from the Anglican Chant, and setting free the rhythm to keep pace with the words. This has certainly much to be said for it; it is indeed a step forward, if not the last word. He admits stresses on words to mark meaning, but not to harden the time. His book, which has been prepared with the assistance of his capable organist, Mr. Seymour Pile, may be commended to all who are interested in this important feature of our worship.

THE CHURCH TIMES.

A little book has just been published which demands, and deserves, more than passing notice. Published in much the same format as The Cathedral Psalter, it proclaims itself to be The Barless Psalter, pointed for use with Anglican Chants: an Easy Book for Choir and Congregation. Note the last word. . . . The Barless Psalter (in spite of, or because of, its lack of bars) is simplicity itself, and could be rendered with ease by any average village choir and congregation. . . . If I were in the position of a choirmaster and had a free hand, I should scrap my existing stock of Psalters—by this time probably fairly worn-out and meet for destruction—and I should, without doubt, experiment upon this extremely sensible book.

THE ORGANIST AND CHOIRMASTER.

This is quite the best Psalter for Anglican Chants we ever remember to have seen. . . . With the suppression of accents during the chant inflexion, it has become possible to avoid to a very large extent the usual objectionable "clatter" on such final words as "righteousness," "testimonies," &c. This fact alone ought to commend the book to the notice of choirmasters who desire to secure smoothness and fluency in their Psalmody. . . . The Barless Psalter seems to us to be the ne plus ultra of the Anglican chanting system.

MUSICAL OPINION.

In the work now under notice, we see nothing of editorial peculiarities; the whole book is the exposition of a principle,—a sound, reasonable, and intelligible principle such as has been enunciated time after time in theory and almost always missed in practice. The editors certainly are justified when they say in conclusion that they have no apology to offer for this book. It certainly needs none, nor will its use need any justification. It really does seem to succeed where so many other books have failed.

MUSICAL NEWS.

The Barless Psalter is a thoughtful contribution towards the solution of the problem of chanting. It is simple in principle, the pointing is dignified, and as the editors have favoured trochaic endings, the "chattering finals" have been eliminated.

THE CHOIR.

If a suitable system can be devised, there is no reason why the chanting of a psalm should not be almost as easy to the ordinary congregation as the singing of a metrical hymn; and the nearest approach to the required simplicity will, we think, be found in the Barless Psalter. . . . The Barless Psalter clearly foreshadows a better state of things, and with its help the day should not be far distant when the chanting of the psalms is as easy an exercise as the singing of a hymn.

NOW ISSUED AS A NET BOOK.

ADDITIONAL HYMNS WITH TUNES FOR USE WITH HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN OR ANY OTHER CHURCH HYMNAL.

272 pages, Imperial 16mo. Cloth Boards, price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Tonic Sol-fa Edition, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Hymns only, Imperial 32mo, Cloth Boards, One Shilling.

Hymns only, medium 32mo, diamond type, cloth, 4d.; paper, 3d.

Complete edition, bound with HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN (Quarto), 6s. 6d. net.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

MARKING SCHEMES AGAIN.

'ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.'

In our March issue we gave in full the marking scheme for competitions adopted by some of the best-known Festivals in the country. It had the misfortune to incur the disapproval of the Daily Telegraph critic, who attended the Blackpool Festival, on the ground that it did not allow enough for interpretation. But it was pointed out that the idea and application of the scheme had been seriously misapprehended, and that in any case it had been associated for years with the admittedly great progress that had been made. Then came the Midland (Birmingham) Festival, where the same system was adopted, and again the Telegraph critic attacked it, saying:

I do not intend to discuss here the unhappy system, referred to on a previous occasion in the Daily Telegraph, of awarding eighty out of a hundred marks for technique and twenty for general effect:

and thus showing an extraordinary misunderstanding of the scheme (how in the world can the thirty marks allowed for interpretation be classed as for technique?).

He went on to say:

Anyone who has the slightest appreciation of the difference between a pianola and the achievement of a musician—or between the most careful work of a draughtsman and the free and spontaneous work of an artist, must know the impasse such a system inevitably leads to.

Thus was the carefully considered work of some of the most experienced adjudicators in the country held up to scorn by a critic who, as we have said, had evidently not even taken the trouble to examine the scheme he was denouncing. There was and has been no 'impasse,' except in the imagination of the critic.

Now, again, the Telegraph, in discussing the recent competitions held at Olympia in connection with the British Music Trades Exhibition, says of the marking scheme adopted:

The distribution of the marks, always a very moot point, seems to be reasonably good; indeed, in only one point is there room for serious criticism. To allot singers only 10 marks out of 100 for attack, pronunciation, and enunciation is obviously wrong. Enunciation has always been a very weak point with British singers, and this is hardly the way to improve it. It is, no doubt, perfectly true that the words of only too many songs are such unutterable rubbish that to make them as unintelligible as possible is to spare the listener unnecessary pain. Still the words of a song are, or should be, of equal importance with the music, a fact which is not, apparently, recognised by the expert musicians who judge competitions. If it were, they would surely give a singer more than 10 marks per cent. for rendering those words intelligible. Otherwise, however, the marks are, as we have said, reasonably well adjusted.

The odd thing about this is that the system approved (with the exception of one detail) is the very selfsame 'unhappy' system used at Blackpool and Birmingham! It was taken en bloc for all classes straight from the Blackpool syllabus.

We are disposed to agree with the author of the latest criticism that enunciation should be more highly valued relatively than it appears to be. In some centres this point has a special prize and is separately assessed.

To save reference we give in brief the scheme which has survived these criticisms:

CHORAL AND VOCAL SOLO CLASSES.		Maximum marks.
Correctness	...	10
Tone, blend, intonation (soloist's voice-production)	...	30
Attack, pronunciation, and enunciation	...	10
Expression, interpretation, and rhythm	...	30
General effect	...	20
Total	...	100

Dr. H. Walford Davies, when he does not follow the above, generally uses the following system:

Accuracy	...	10
Precision (including neatness of attack and finish)	...	10
Tone (including evenness, blend, and balance)	...	15
Enunciation	...	10
Intonation	...	10
Energy (including rhythmic sense and unanimity)	...	10
Expression (including sostenuto and delicacy of phrasing)	...	15
Interpretation (including choice of tempi and general effect)	...	20
Total	...	100

The following is the system adopted by the Royal Academy of Music in its Metropolitan Examination for

SOLO SINGING.

Quality	...	12
Volume	...	12
Management and control of breath	...	16
Production (including blending of the registers)	...	16
Correctness of intonation	...	16
Vocalisation and flexibility (including excellence of scales, arpeggios, shakes, &c.)	...	16
Distinctness and correctness of pronunciation	...	16
Phrasing, expression, and variety of tone	...	16
Rhythm, time, and accent	...	12
Recitative	...	12
Posture and facial expression	...	8
Conception of the general character of the pieces	...	16
Reading at sight	...	12
Examiners' general impression of candidate's capabilities as a performer	...	20
Total	...	200

With reference to the comments on 'A Myth' that appeared in our September number, we find at the moment of going to press that the matter was to some extent dealt with in the July issue of the Choir. We are sorry this number escaped our attention. Further comment must be postponed until our November issue.

The recently-issued official report of the Midland Musical Competition Festival, which was held on May 20 to 24 in Birmingham, is a formidable and impressive publication. It is printed in newspaper form about the size of the Daily Telegraph, and comprises fourteen pages on which are closely printed all the detailed reports of the adjudicators. The front page is adorned (some would say) by portraits of the chief officials and the adjudicators. It is a wonderful record of a great event. It costs 2d. (and 1d. postage). The secretaries are Messrs. G. J. Bowker and F. W. Stevens, Queen's College, Paradise Street, Birmingham. The next Festival will be held on May 20 to 23, 1914.

EISTEDDFOD 'CUP-HUNTING.'

Under this head (a hardly justifiable one, inasmuch as it is not cups that Welsh choirs compete for) the Daily Telegraph of August 27 printed the following reference to statements by Sir Frederic Cowen in Wales (a Welsh journal):

'Wales, with everything to inspire her,' he says, 'does not appear to have progressed in art. Such a country—a country rich in legends of the past and with its wealth of romances of centuries—should surely have produced great artists. My own theory is that the retention and use of its language has served to isolate Wales from this great world of Art. Devotion to language does not, as a rule, make for progress.'

Discussing the Eisteddfod, he remarks that all the efforts and energies of the Welsh people are for about a year beforehand concentrated not so much on the merit of their performances, as on the desire to be first, and so wrest the prize from someone else.

'To begin with, that in itself is absolutely fatal to the cause of music. The Welsh choirs spend at least eight months in the year in getting up three or four pieces, two at least of which, to speak candidly, are very trivial and quite unworthy of the efforts of big choirs. The whole of this time is devoted to nothing else. They come to the Eisteddfod, and they sing these things excellently, I grant you, but still in a purely mechanical fashion.

'It must inevitably be mechanical after all that preparation. They have practically no interest in anyone else's work, and they cannot compare their own merits and defects with those of other choirs, because they do not even trouble to listen to them. The result is that the whole thing resolves itself into a kind of betting place, where the only desire is to know who wins and who loses. If they win they are elated; if they lose they declare the adjudicators to be wrong, and consequently there is a good deal of ill-feeling.

'Now what good does that do to the progress of music as an art? It keeps on retarding it year after year. I was at an Eisteddfod twenty years ago, and from that time to this I have seen no progress whatever in the love of music for itself.'

He declares that one of the chief causes of failure to do great things in the past has been the competitive element in the Eisteddfod. 'There ought to be more genuine music and less cup-hunting. If the Eisteddfod authorities would be content with only two days' competitive singing, and would spend a little more money and devote the remainder of the musical scheme to getting a good orchestra, that would be a great advance.

'At present the orchestra is purely local, and oftentimes a very poor one. Why should not the people have a chance of hearing a really excellent one? The expense would certainly be a little heavy at first, and it would take a few years to bring about the change; but in the course of time they would get to love music, not for what cups they could win, but solely for itself. At present the Eisteddfod, it must be said, is not an artistic but a money-making institution.'

On the next day (August 28) the following letter appeared:

SIR,—In your issue to-day you quote from Wales an interview with Sir Frederic Cowen, in which he finds grave fault with the musical outcome of Eisteddfodau. With much that he says I regret it is impossible to disagree, but in justice to many Welsh musicians, I think your English readers should know that there is another and brighter side of the picture. Wales is not entirely given up to Eisteddfodau. During only the last few months I have had the satisfaction of recording excellent concert performances of choral and other works at the following places—at Tonerfai (Schubert's 'Song of the Spirits' was an item), Tredegar, Trebarris, Cardiff (a remarkable performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion, under Mr. Roderick Williams, whose choir was so eminently successful at the recent Abergavenny Eisteddfod), Tywardreath (Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast'), The South Wales Musical Festival, held in four towns on April 21 to 24—namely, Swansea (Mendelssohn's 'Antigone,' with the Queen's Hall Orchestra and Sir Henry Wood), Neath (Bantock's 'Omar Khayyâm,' Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, and the 'Meistersinger' Overture), Mountain Ash (Elgar's 'King Olaf,' the composer conducting, and Edward German's 'Welsh Rhapsody'), and Newport ('The Dream of Gerontius'). At Llanelly, in June, an audience of 2,500 people attended a performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' and Rhyl at about the same time gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' Then there are the oratorio performances of the Welsh Choral Union at Liverpool, under Mr. Harry Evans, which by general consent are among the best and most complete given in this country. But most notably, as exhibiting the unquestionable love of the Welsh folk for music for its own sake, the Festival held at Harlech Castle on July 3 deserves attention. There were over 2,000 singers, representing a combination of numerous choirs. They sang to and with one another all day long, and finished with a performance of Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation,' in which the whole of the choirs combined. There was an immense audience, and the singing was thrilling. The choirs had worked for months on the various works performed. There was no competition, and, therefore, no prospect of monetary reward, and all the singers paid their own expenses.—Yours faithfully, 160, Wardour Street, August 27. W. G. McNAUGHT.

MONEY-PRIZES AT COMPETITIONS.

The following are extracts from a letter written by Mr. Lionel H. Franceys (hon. secretary, Blackpool Festival), which was read at the recent Leeds Conference of the Association of Competition Musical Festivals:

Let me first of all preface my remarks by assuring you that my sympathies have always been, and still are, upon the side of those who advocate no money-prizes, as being an ideal devoutly to be prayed for, but after twelve years' experience among the thousands of competitors and prize-winners who have attended the Blackpool Festival, I can confidently assert that prizes such as those offered at Blackpool do not rouse the cupidity of the winners, nor does the loss of them leave any feeling of regret in the minds of the losers at all commensurate with that left by the consciousness of failure. I could show you many letters that I have received from time to time from the prize-winners and competitors in all classes that would conclusively prove it is not the money they value so much as the certificate, or their permanent evidence of success.

And now what is really at the bottom of this agitation against money-prizes? A little introspection is sometimes good for us. Honestly speaking, I think a good deal of it, if not all, is affectation. Of course, I know that the conjunction of money and art is considered degrading to the latter, and to their everlasting disgrace many examples could be given of those with whom this has been the result, but, as in all such cases, it is the abuse and not the use of money that has produced the downfall of art, and there are a hundred cases to one such case where money has proved the handmaiden of art. Where is the difference between competitors accepting the use of other people's money subscribed for the purpose—we will not speak of charity—to compete at a festival where there are no money-prizes and no entry fees, and competitors who pay their entry fees at a practically self-supporting festival where money-prizes are offered? To my mind the latter is the more conducive to self-respect in the competitor than is the former. It is all very well for those of us who are well supplied with this world's goods to scoff at others who sing for these money-prizes, but if the guinea and a-half, which is the highest prize offered in our solo classes, were as much to us as it is to those who have their living to earn, and the money to save before they can afford a few cheap lessons and pay for the music and railway fare, we should not be so ready to condemn the desire, subordinate as it most certainly is, to obtain something with the certificate to recoup a portion of the expenditure.

With respect to the larger prizes for orchestras and choirs, these again I consider as fully earned, the money being usually spent before the choirs reach the Festival.

At Blackpool we go very carefully into the question of expenses incurred by competitors, and in all the numerous cases coming under our notice, where competing choirs come from a distance without a radius of twenty-five miles, the first-prize money is entirely inadequate to pay the expenses incurred. In one case a choir that came from the East Coast had to stay over from Saturday until Monday at a cost of upwards of £100, and won a prize of under £10. Another that came from London at a similar cost won £99s.; and I could quote other cases.

It has been said, again, that these choirs should be supported by local interest, not to say charity, but personally I should think that every self-respecting choir would prefer to win the necessary sinews of war from the result of its own efforts rather than by taking round the hat. I know of many such choirs that are entirely self-supporting, and that rely upon a certain amount of prize-money to keep them out of debt. To such choirs it is essential to their very existence, or, at least, continuance, that they should win; they have, so to speak, burnt their boats. Is not a choir bound to sing better under such an impulse? It certainly is a fact that they do. It was in this spirit that our Norman forefathers conquered England, and why should we deprecate the same spirit in the democracy of the present day? It is only a difference in the values of the prizes. I have myself temporarily financed a choir to the extent of £20 to £30 to carry out a raid on such a trophy as the Morecambe Challenge Shield, and considered I was giving no small assistance to the cause by so doing. I may add that my enthusiasm was by no means led astray by the result, and I am still doing my utmost to promote the cause. Finally, my conviction is that there must always be prizes of a monetary description. But keep them always subordinate to the intrinsic value of the success; all my experience goes to prove that this can be done. After being for twelve years in constant and active touch with the movement, I still think it is essential to the success of our enterprise that at least the prize-winners should be immune from loss when competing at our Festivals.

THE NATIONAL BROTHERHOOD FESTIVAL, CRYSTAL PALACE.—August 30.

This organization has a strong social basis. One of its objects is thus stated:

To encourage the ministry of music in connection with our Brotherhoods and Sisterhoods. It is believed that the band and choir contests will stimulate our Societies to greater efficiency in this respect. Indeed it is already doing so, for male-voice choirs are now being formed with the object of taking part in the Great Choral Festival on the Handel orchestra, and others will no doubt be formed, as well as bands and orchestras after the fête.

In pursuance of this aim a musical Festival took place at the Crystal Palace on the above day. It was hoped that there would be 4,000 men in the large choir, but owing to railway and other difficulties only about 2,000 were gathered. Even as it was, this was probably the largest men's-voice choir that has ever performed in this country. The programme was as follows:

'All hail the power of Jesu's Name'	...	John Goss
'O taste and see'	...	W. T. Deane
'Chorus of the Brotherhood'	...	Carey Bonner
'A song of men of old'	...	Ch. Gounod
'Soldiers' Chorus, from 'Faust'	...	John Stevenson
'See our oars with feathered spray'	...	Arthur Sullivan
'The beleaguered'	...	J. L. Hatton
'Stars of the summer night'	...	Ch. Gounod
'Send out Thy light'	...	Adolphe Adam
'The comrades' song of hope'	...	Arthur Sullivan
'The long day closes'	...
'The Hallelujah Chorus'	(Arranged for men's voices)

The tone was amazingly good. There were no symptoms of strain in the high notes of the tenor part, the quality was agreeably sweet, and the bass quality was also highly satisfactory. Hatton's part-song was sung quite charmingly, and was encored, as it well deserved to be. Even in the matter of rhythm and attack there was much to praise—a result due, no doubt, to the influence of Mr. G. W. Williams, the veteran conductor, who has often shown his skill in managing large bodies of singers. The programme, notwithstanding its mono-colour, did not tire the ear, except perhaps at the end, when the 'Hallelujah Chorus' rather flagged.

Besides the concert on the Handel orchestra, there were choral and orchestral competitions held during the day. The choral competitions were in three classes, and the entries were satisfactory. We regret that we are unable to give the results just now, because, owing to the numbering of choirs in the programme differing from the order in which they competed, we cannot identify the winners. The idea was that the judge should not know which choir was singing. Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

NEW BRIGHTON.—September 13.

This was the thirteenth annual competition at this centre. The following were the results:

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS (under sixteen years of age).

(Thirty to forty voices.)

Test: 'The Viking's song' (Coleridge-Taylor).

Out of ten entries the Primitive Methodist Juvenile Choir, Golden Hill (Mr. Fred J. Bossons), carried off the prize.

BOYS' SOLO (under sixteen years).

Test: 'Lord, at all times' (Mendelssohn).

1st. Master H. Park Moorhouse.

SOLO SINGING.

Soprano.

Test: 'So shall the lute and harp awake' ('Judas Maccabeus').

1st. Miss Florrie Harrison.

Contralto.

Test: 'Like to the damask rose' (Elgar).

1st. Miss Amy Jowett.

Tenor.

Test: 'Sound an alarm' ('Judas Maccabeus').

1st. Mr. Willie Rees.

Baritone.

Test: 'The wanderer' (Schubert).

1st. Mr. William Shaw.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

(Eleven entries.)

Tests: 'It's oh, to be a wild wind' (Elgar).

'Feasting I watch' (Elgar).

1st. Todmorden Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Harold Lees).

2nd. Nelson Arion Glee Union (Mr. Lawson Berry).

3rd. Southport Vocal Union (Mr. J. C. Clarke).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

(Eight entries.)

Tests: 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' (Wilbye).

'Come, pretty wag' (Hubert Parry).

1st. Hanley and District Choral Society (Mr. E. C. Redfern).

2nd. The William Woolley Choral Society (Mr. William Woolley).

3rd. Providence Upper Hanley Choir (Mr. E. Rathbone).

ACTION-SONG (for children under twelve years of age).

(Seven entries.)

1st. Rydal Juvenile Action Party.

2nd. Excelsior Action Party.

Adjudicators: Mr. Harry Evans, Dr. Roland Rogers.

BRITISH MUSIC EXHIBITION.

The closing contests at the British Music Exhibition at Olympia took place on September 20, when the Lady Mayoress, who was accompanied by the Lord Mayor, presented the prizes. The principal winners were: Pianoforte playing: Class 1, Miss W. H. Wainwright; Class 2, Mr. A. Hallis; Class 3, Miss D. Fell; Class 4, Miss Ivy Hyman. Sopranos' competition: Miss E. K. Bilsland. Mezzo-sopranos: Miss S. B. Hamlin. Contraltos: Miss E. Gough. Tenors: Mr. G. Ashforde. Baritones: Mr. C. R. Oberst. Basses: Mr. J. A. Barclay. Ladies' duets: The Misses N. Arnoss and N. Innes. Vocal sight-reading: Miss E. M. Harry, Mr. R. Bineham. Violin playing: Class 1, Miss O. Harte; Class 2, Miss E. Hart. Organ playing: Class 1, Mr. C. G. Bowden; Class 2, Master J. W. Craft. There were about 400 entries for pianoforte playing, about 300 for solo singing, 50 for violin playing, 11 for violoncello, and 25 for organ playing. The prizes were exceptionally valuable, consisting in several cases of grand pianofortes. The adjudicators were Madame Larkcom, Mr. Sydney Blakiston, Mr. Clifton Cooke, Mr. Frederick Corder, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Dr. H. A. Harding, Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, Mr. Claude P. Landi, and Dr. E. Markham Lee.

MANCHESTER.—September 19 and 20.

The Manchester and District Nonconformist Choir Union Competitive Vocal and Instrumental Festival, held at the White City on September 19 and 20, proved highly successful, attracting as it did some 200 entries in the fourteen classes with an aggregate of 800 competitors.

The opening day was devoted to the juveniles, when thirty-six aspiring vocalists and thirty budding pianists were heard in four classes, the first prize-winners being:

GIRLS' SOLO.

Test: 'Happy day' (W. Sanderson).

Marjorie Brown.

BOYS' SOLO.

Test: 'Under the greenwood tree.'

Reginald Wright.

JUNIOR PIANOFORTE.

Test: 'Larghetto' (Beethoven).

Frank K. Owen.

SENIOR PIANOFORTE.

Test: 'Bavarian dances, No. 1' (Elgar).

G. Sydney Ellison.

The principal event on the Saturday was the Open Mixed-Voice Contest, in which the following six choirs competed for the Wagstaff Challenge Shield, and sang Bantock's 'Emmer's lament' and J. C. Bridge's setting of 'Come, lasses and lads':

2nd. Salford Vocal Society (F. W. Blacow).

Matlock Vocal Society (G. S. Wildgoose).

1st. Altrincham Primitive Methodist (J. A. Hill).

Edgeley Wesleyan Sunday School (F. L. Ford).

Failsword Co-operative Choral Society (J. E. Smith).

Manchester Clarion Vocal Union (Mr. Corlett).

And after a competition which, as the judge observed, reached a very high level, he awarded the first place to Altrincham with 177 marks, and the second to Salford with 169.

Several of the above choirs also appeared in the class for Free Church Choirs, in which nine sang Tchaikovsky's 'Hymn to the Trinity' and Bruce Steane's Magnificat in F, and here again premier honours were awarded to:

1st. Altrincham Primitive Methodist (J. A. Hill).

2nd. Walkden Wesleyan (Bertram Lightbourn).

A new feature this year was a competition for Sunday School Choirs, arranged in conjunction with the Manchester Sunday School Union. Each of the six competing choirs sang two hymns from the annual Whitsuntide hymn selection issued by the Union, with the result that the Longsight Wesleyan Sunday School (T. W. Hodkin) carried off the 'Sir Alexander Porter' Challenge Shield, Central Openshaw United Methodist (G. E. Clarke) being placed second.

The principal prize-winners in the other classes were:

MALE-VOICE QUARTET.

Test: 'When the hues of daylight' (Reissiger).
Matlock Lyric.

MIXED-VOICE QUARTET.

Test: 'Who is Sylvia?' (Edward German).
Æolian Party, Radcliffe.

SOPRANO SOLO.

Test: 'Serenade' (Bantock).
Minnie Barlow, Altrincham.

CONTRALTO SOLO.

Test: Aria, 'Thou shalt bring them in' (Handel).
Annie L. Jones, Stretford.

TENOR SOLO.

Test: 'Eleanore' (Coleridge-Taylor).
Arthur E. Danby, Atherton.

BASS SOLO.

Test: 'The Old Superb' (C. V. Stanford).
Albert G. Dalgleish, Prestwich.

Mr. Harry Evans and Mr. Fred. W. Clay proved a popular pair of adjudicators.

THE BLACKPOOL FESTIVAL.—October 13 to 18.

The interest in this event shows no signs of abatement. In fact the Festival continues to expand, and this year its operations encroach upon another day, as they begin on the Monday instead of, as before, on the Tuesday. On that evening Mr. Cecil Sharp is to superintend a demonstration of folk-dancing, and he will witness the local efforts in that popular art. The choral entries are as follows: Mixed-voice, 20; male-voice, 24; female-voice, 19; church and chapel, 16; children's, 35; total, 114. Besides these there will be between 500 and 600 adult solo singers, and various solo instrumentalists, action-songs, and folk-dance parties. Verily a feast of music for all tastes. The chief choral tests are, as usual, of the highest order. All particulars can be obtained from the hon. secretary, Mr. Lionel H. Franceys, Musical Festival Offices, Blackpool.

A NEW PAIR OF HANDS

The Postal Course of MACDONALD SMITH'S System of Perfect Pianoforte Playing has been taken by many professionals holding the highest degrees and diplomas in music.

One says: "To me it has been a veritable godsend." Another: "I play better than ever." Another: "I have never spent £3 3s. to greater advantage in all my musical life." Another: "Your System has given me practically a NEW PAIR OF HANDS."

Are you content still to go on in the old way?

If you desire a new pair of hands for your Piano Playing, write in the first instance for the Illustrated Book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing" (free by post), to M. MACDONALD SMITH.

Playing at Sight Is Easy—Not Difficult.

The generally accepted idea amongst pianists—whether professionals or amateurs—is that nothing but continual practice will give the ability to play at sight. As an actual fact, this is far from being the case, since by means of the EHREMYER System, the ability can be acquired after three months of practice for a short time daily. In this time any pianist can acquire the ability to play at sight all music that is not beyond his technical powers. Only a few have the natural gift of sight-playing, but all others have now the opportunity to become sight-players without the drudgery of practice which has hitherto been necessary.

EVERY MUSICIAN WHO SEEKS TO CULTIVATE

SIGHT-READING

MEMORISING, NERVE-CONTROL; TO BANISH SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS, so as to Play in Public with Ease and Mastery, TO DEVELOP HIS SENSE OF HEARING, so as to make it Finer, more Acute, more Analytical; TO GET BETTER RESULTS FROM HIS DAILY PRACTICE,

Should practise the Principles and Methods of the world-famous Concentro Course—"Scientific Concentration." Concentration, scientifically applied, is recognised by every musician of front rank as the basis of all good playing, sight-reading, memorising, and musical study in general. The musician who practises

Scientific Concentration easily outstrips the musician without this aid. He can keep his mind solely on his playing, thus making every minute of his practice tell. He plays with less fatigue and acquires a strong, confident personality—of the utmost importance in relation to his pupils and public performances. No musical education is complete without this valuable Course.

LONDON RONALD, Esq.,

The famous Conductor, and Principal of the Guildhall School of Music, referring to the Concentro Course, says:—

"SCIENTIFIC CONCENTRATION" SHOULD BE OF VERY GREAT VALUE TO THOSE LACKING CONCENTRATION."

Thousands of Students in every part of the civilised world are practising "SCIENTIFIC CONCENTRATION."

Learn all it will do for You. SEND TO-DAY FOR FREE BOOKLET and the TESTIMONY of STUDENTS, EMINENT PUBLIC MEN, and the EDITORS of WELL-KNOWN JOURNALS, to—10.3.13.

BRINSMEAD PIANOS

KENTFORD, SUFFOLK,

Messrs. BRINSMEAD & SONS,

Dear Sirs,—May I convey to you my sincere appreciation of your fine pianos. I have used them at the bulk of my concerts, and the instruments played on at the three of my concerts this year have been even better in tone and singing quality than any I have had before. That any one in England should have an idea that English Pianos are not superior in durability, power, and workmanship passes my comprehension. I wish you all continued success in the manufacture of a first-class instrument. Perhaps the most remarkable quality of your pianos is the freedom of touch.

Most sincerely yours,

(Signed) JOSEF HOLBROOKE.

FREDERICK CORDER.

Frederick Corder was born at Hackney, London, on January 26, 1852. His father was an excellent amateur musician, able to play efficiently several stringed instruments and the organ. His mother, too, had musical gifts, and was a very good pianist. Quartet playing was a prominent feature of the social family life. Thus surrounded by good musical influences, the inherited musical faculty of the boy was nurtured. He had lessons on the pianoforte, but there was no desire on the part of his parents that he should specialise in music. Three years of his youth were spent in France, and whilst there he had only conventional school instruction in pianoforte playing. On his return to London he was placed under the late Henry Gadsby. Up to this period he had shown no particular leaning towards composition, but later, some lessons in harmony, taken from Mr. Claude Couldery, stimulated his mind in this direction, and led him to devote much time to the study of orchestral scores, in some cases lent to him by Mr. Georg Henschel, from whom he received friendly advice. But most of his study was unassisted. At the age of eighteen he was sent to business; a sphere of activity from which he was withdrawn after a few years, fortunately as it happened, owing to changes in the firm with which he was connected. He now succeeded in convincing his parents that he was best fitted for a musical career, and when (in 1873) he was twenty-one years of age, they resolved to send him to the then only head-quarters of the art in this country, the Royal Academy of Music. At that time Sterndale Bennett was the Principal of the Academy, but Corder came very little under his influence. He was placed under George Macfarren, the chief professor of harmony and composition (who soon afterwards succeeded Sterndale Bennett as Principal), under W. G. Cusins for pianoforte, and under Watson for violin, an instrument the study of which he did not afterwards pursue.

It was in Macfarren's class that he found congenial scope for his budding abilities. Macfarren was a man of forceful character, distinguished by intense earnestness of conviction, and in matters musical by an almost passionate conservatism. He had become totally blind, a misfortune which mercifully had some compensation in intensifying the acuteness of his remarkable ear and musical memory. He was an uncompromising advocate of the Day theory of harmony, which he expounded eloquently in six lectures* given at the Royal Institution, and the principles of which he embodied in his well-known 'Rudiments of Harmony,' a luminous and highly practical treatise even if it is admitted that it is founded on an erroneous natural theory.

Corder had imbibed deeply at Wagnerian springs before he came to the Academy, and it was with some disappointment that he found Macfarren unsympathetic in this direction. In fact, Wagner was a bête noire to Macfarren, and he was always warning students against the iniquities of the music of the future. But notwithstanding his prejudices, which were shared by many of his contemporaries, his vast knowledge and experience made him a great teacher. The present writer, who was also in Macfarren's class at that time, well remembers incidents that were amazing evidence of his ability. Corder would bring fearsome full scores that struck his fellow students with awe and envy. The orchestration having been played piece-meal, Macfarren would soon show that the whole picture was complete in his mind's eye, and he would proceed to analyse it in detail.

In 1875 Corder competed for and won the Mendelssohn Scholarship, then as now the most important prize of its kind offered in this country. He proceeded to the Conservatoire at Cologne, which was then under Ferdinand Hiller. Here a new world was opened to the young musician. Besides the instruction from Hiller (composition) and Isidor Seiss (pianoforte), there were operas and classical concerts galore to be attended. Altogether this was the most pregnant period of Corder's musical education. Hiller, like Macfarren, was a non-progressive. He stated once to Corder that music had come to an end with Mendelssohn. Schumann he did not care for, and Wagner he did not know except through Corder. He did not approve of the mosaic use of leit-motif, and this form of development was not music to him. When Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto was brought to Seiss by Corder the professor threw the copy off the desk. Corder stayed three years at Cologne, and spent the remaining year of his scholarship in Italy. Here he did not seek systematic instruction, but he heard the little music offered at Milan and elsewhere, and made the acquaintance of Boito and Verdi and other Italian musicians. In 1879 he returned to London, but only to drink a cup of bitterness, for with all his acquirements and culture it soon appeared that the Metropolis had no use for him. His views on the situation and what it led to are best described in his own words:

The complete narration of my youthful deeds would far outrun the space at my disposal; suffice it to say that I only commenced my serious musical education at the age when most students are finishing it—namely, at the age of twenty-one. After a couple of years at the Royal Academy I obtained—to my own intense astonishment—the Mendelssohn Scholarship, and pursued my studies for the following four years abroad. Honestly, I could have done much better in London, but I had the advantage of foreign travel. A serious drawback was that I was married. Not that the marriage was anything but a blessing, but because no man should take a wife unless he can see some reasonable prospect of keeping the wolf from the door. A few years of hard times is no bad thing for a young man, but the terror of seeing his wife and children menaced by starvation is a hideous trial.

* Six Lectures on Harmony, Longmans, Green & Co.

Behold me when my scholarship was up, like Robinson Crusoe, taking stock of my belongings and prospects. I had had an excellent training in things which were of no practical service to me; I played the pianoforte just not well enough to play in public, and the violin hardly at all. There was, as there is now, no possible opening for a composer, and I was thrust into an organist's appointment, though I had never studied the instrument. On a pound a week we lived in one room and were quite happy, in spite of the gloomy outlook. I 'devil'd' for one or two critics, and wrote articles for Grove's 'Dictionary.' I wrote comic musical articles for the papers; even edited a paper for six months during the illness of the chief; arranged music and furnished translations of songs for any publisher who would let me—they were all fairly ready to take this sort of work, but the mere sight of an original MS. made them want to call for the police. At last, through the kindness of Mr. Alfred Littleton, I got a commission to furnish a cantata for a provincial Festival, and this led to another, and to the production of my opera, 'Nordisa.' From the cantatas I gained scarcely anything, but the opera brought me in, first and last, nearly £300. But all this was the labour of eight years, during which I lived from hand to mouth in the most precarious way.

My whole heart being set upon operatic composition, the demise of Carl Rosa was a death-blow to my hopes, and I drifted into the position I now occupy really against my will. Knowing nothing of the art of teaching, I naturally began by loathing it. I shall never forget my first two pianoforte pupils—two fairly average girls whom my former master, Cusins, contrived to put in my way. They both thought they could play, and I took a savage pleasure in undeceiving them, jeering at their poor efforts as if their ignorance were an intentional affront to me. Of course I soon lost them, as I did others. It was long before, comparing my results with those of really great teachers, I discovered how little I really knew about the matter, and, whether in pianoforte or harmony, had to learn my business from the very beginning. And the whole secret of success as a teacher I can tell you in a very few words. Make friends of your pupils and their belongings—interest yourself in their interests. It is not of the faintest use getting circulars with testimonials printed; the recommendation of one pupil who really likes you is sufficient: your connection will increase, perpetually and inevitably. It is weary waiting at first, and one most exasperating worry that besets the young teacher is that whatever district he chooses for his abode, however he may try to live near his work, all his appointments will be in scattered and distant places.

(From the R. A. M. Club Magazine, November, 1909, by kind permission of the Editor.)

But it was not very long before hope dawned in the shape of an appointment to direct the music at the Brighton Aquarium, then a place of popular resort. Here the new conductor was provided with a small but thoroughly efficient permanent orchestra of eighteen performers, which for special events was increased to fifty. It is worth while to record that the permanent orchestra included F. James (bassoon), Collins (flute), Jamieson (trombone), Cooper (clarinet), who have since become well-known players, and Kottaun, a very fine cornet player, for whom Corder wrote a Concerto in three movements, which was brilliantly performed. The experience of conducting these resources was a valuable one to Corder, because it enabled him to become closely acquainted with the classical Symphonies and numerous other orchestral works. But, unfortunately, after two years' trial the Aquarium scheme failed, and Corder was again stranded. An engagement to direct the music at the Devonshire Park Theatre, Eastbourne, was a stop-gap which served the useful purpose of forcing him to make the most of very limited resources; a severe school which has trained many excellent orchestral writers. Meantime he began to write the critical articles, chiefly in the Musical Times, which made him well-known to a large circle of musicians. Analytical accounts of Wagner's chief operas, which appeared in our 1882 volume, were followed year by year by many miscellaneous contributions. The 1884 volume included a set of articles on Spohr's operas. In 1885 a long and important article on Bishop's operas appeared, and in the same volume the Faust legend and its musical treatment by composers were exhaustively treated in a set of articles spread over six numbers. In 1886 his Cantata, 'The bridal of Triermain,' was published by Messrs. Novello, and produced at the Wolverhampton Festival. This was followed by the acceptance of his romantic opera 'Nordisa' by the Carl Rosa Opera Company. The work was produced with marked success at Liverpool on January 26, 1887, and excited great enthusiasm. After several repetitions at Liverpool, the company took the work on tour, and it was always received with satisfaction. In the quotations from the R.A.M. Club Magazine given above, the fact that Mr. Corder had married early in his career (the event took place in 1879) is recorded. How closely his wife had identified herself with his life's work will be seen from the poem which appeared in the printed copy of the opera:

Poor words that from a pen yet new and nerveless,
Creep, infant-like, with form and limbs uncouth!
Poor strains that from the soul are poured reserveless,
Yet turbid with the storm and stress of youth!
Poor soul, sore tempted, yet of purpose swerveless,
Defeated oft, yet striving toward the truth!

Confront the world for judgment must you—shall you,
How can it set you at your rightful value?

But one has known you in your first beginning,
When life seemed marble, grief an iron shroud!
Through stone and steel the way to freedom winning,
She bore the Light that pierces sorrow's cloud!
O may she thus, when my life-days are thinning,
Still soothe defeat and brighten triumph proud!

Beneath that ray my working hand grows steady:
Why dedicate my work? 'Tis hers already.

On May 4, 1887, 'Nordisa' was performed by the Carl Rosa Company, at Drury Lane Theatre, where it had a mixed reception, some critics affecting to believe that because its melodies were cast in a popular and more or less conventional mould the composer was not serious. No doubt it was a mistake to produce the opera in so large an arena. But whatever the cause, it did not succeed in London. It continued, however, to be a welcome feature of the company's repertory in the provinces. Corder had notions of further operatic composition, but the death of Carl Rosa in 1889 led, as stated above, to the abandonment of effort in this direction.

In 1888 Dr. (now Sir) Alexander Mackenzie was appointed Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and was soon on the look-out for the best lieutenants available. After hearing a performance of Corder's Overture 'Prospero,' in 1889, he invited the composer to become Harmony and Composition professor at the Academy, and also its Curator, an office which, although invented for the occasion, is far from being a sinecure. These flattering offers were accepted by Corder, and thus after an absence of fourteen years from his Alma Mater he entered upon what turned out to be the most influential period of his career. There is more than a dash of cynicism in Corder's character, and the situation in which he now found himself may have afforded some scope for its exercise. As owing to the conditions of things in this country there is little or no market for wares of the description he was able to offer, he would assist sanguine young men to provide more! Is a composer likely to be an ideal teacher? The subject is a debatable one. It may be argued that inasmuch as a composer acquires fixed methods of working and uses idioms derived from his personality and self-expression, he is rather too likely to shape in only one way the plastic material he essays to mould. But however this may be, Corder, by his strong personality and exceptional acquirements, soon drew around him a number of the most gifted students, many of whom have since distinguished themselves more by their independence and originality than by their adherence to convention. Some of the best-known are J. B. McEwen, Granville Bantock, Josef Holbrooke, W. H. Bell, Hubert Bath, Harry Farjeon, B. J. Dale, York Bowen, Montague Phillips, A. von Ahn Carse, Arnold Bax, and his own clever son, Paul Corder.

In 1896 he gave three lectures at the Royal Institution on 'Three emotional composers, Berlioz, Wagner, and Liszt.' In singling out Wagner's 'Tristan,' 'Siegfried,' 'Meistersinger' and 'Parsifal,' he declares that:

It is impossible to say which is the greater work because it is so difficult to compare them. Each stands as a peerless monument to be admired more and more as time goes on; to suffer temporary eclipse, possibly, by some recent rival, but never to sink into oblivion while any art-worshippers exist.

This year (1896), too, saw the first publication of his work on 'The orchestra, and how to write for it.*' It is written with characteristic force and clearness. One feature in the treatise is a notable declaration against

THE TRUMPET.

I desire here to record my emphatic opinion that the trumpet in the orchestra is an almost unmitigated nuisance. In the small orchestra of Haydn and Mozart it obliterates everything else, and dare only be used here and there in the padding; in the modern orchestra it is useless because of its limited scale, while in the music of Bach and Handel it is a source of constant vexation of spirit.

Against this is favourably contrasted

THE CORNET.

In the theatre-band, the cornet is necessarily abused; in the concert-orchestra I maintain that in competent hands it can play not only all existing trumpet-parts more discreetly and bearably than the trumpet itself, but can furnish a far better upper part to the trombone harmony. A good cornet player can do all that a trumpet player can, and do it nearly as brilliantly; while, as to bad players, which is the worst—to play your notes with a vulgar twang, or to crack them and spoil the music?

Another practical manual addressed to students, entitled 'Modern Musical Composition,' was published in 1909.* In the introduction the author remarks:

Composition is as much a constructive art as joinery or architecture, and must therefore be practised consciously until long use and experience enable us to exercise our painfully acquired powers subconsciously. Yet nearly everyone begins with a vague idea that he has only to turn his eyes up to heaven, like a prophet in a picture, to be delivered of a musical work complete in all its parts. I would advise a perusal of Edgar Allan Poe's fine essay on 'The Philosophy of Composition' as the most effectual antidote to this pernicious delusion. It is only possible for the long and highly-trained expert to dispense with the searchlight of ratiocination, and it is very doubtful whether even he gains anything by so doing. But it is in the nature of the person of feeling to want to do everything by unbridled impulse, as it is in the nature of the intellectual person to love to fill up a form. The real artist—a combination of the two—reasons out his work first; then, having fashioned it in the rough, he re-writes and re-writes until the bare bones are quite hidden. I am aware that cold intelligence and hot enthusiasm are two oddly-matched steeds for the chariot of Phœbus Apollo, but they must be taught to go in double harness, neither leading, but side by side and mutually helpful.

Corder was one of the first promoters, and he is now the chairman, of the Society of British Composers, which was established in 1905. He has always been jealous for the interests of the native composer, and through this Society, supported by the Avison fund for the publication of new music, a good work has been accomplished.

The following are some of Corder's obiter dicta on MENDELSSOHN.

In speaking of this composer, 'brilliant' is the adjective that rises first and always to one's thoughts. Favoured by fortune, by nature, by circumstances, his life was happy, his career meteoric, and his fame unclouded as long as his personality endured. I have always thought that he affords, among musicians, a close parallel to the position of Charles Dickens among novelists. Both leapt to instant fame, both had the same power of dazzling their innumerable admirers, and both swept criticism entirely aside until after their deaths.

The student of music will find much food for thought in a comparison of the careers and works of Mendelssohn and Schumann. The latter, with a steadily decaying brain, mediocre gifts, and a wretched technique which declined instead of improving with time—this man's work eclipsed, by sheer force of poetry and artistic intention, the polished and admirable music of his polished and admirable rival. This was no matter of caprice on the part of a fickle public. It was pushing an analogy too far to compare the clumsy Schumann to the able Thackeray, yet in the rivalry of the two composers we have the rivalry of the two novelists very closely portrayed.

To conclude by a statement of what musical art owes to Mendelssohn, we may say that he gave a fresh lease of life to oratorio, which in his hands was dignified without being dull, and melodious without a suggestion of triviality, although the 'Song without words' for piano is his speciality, and he carries that type of music everywhere. The picturesque Concert overture, of which the 'Hebrides' and 'Midsummer Night's Dream' are such wonderful specimens, is also an invention of his. Far less happy are his Symphonies; yet to give a national flavour to this kind of work was a new idea. His use of the orchestra was a great technical advance on anything before attempted; but here he was so quickly outshone by Liszt, Wagner, Verdi, and the contemporary French writers, that it seems to us now his weak side instead of his strength. His pianoforte-writing was effective and novel, if open to the charge of meretriciousness, and his knowledge of the powers of the human voice was certainly unsurpassed by any later composer. All these great merits and failings are indeed summed up in the one epithet bestowed in the first sentence of this article: he was a brilliant creature.—(From a programme-book, November, 1906.)

Monographs on Beethoven and Wagner for use in the 'Masterpieces of Music' series are the most recent of Corder's critical contributions.

If the world has lost something by reason of Corder's comparative inactivity as a composer, it has certainly been well compensated by the widespread influence of his work as a teacher and critic.

FOLK-SONG IN MODERN MUSIC.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

After having succeeded in establishing a distinction between the question of nationality in music and that of the use of folk-tunes in art-music, and in reaching the preliminary negative conclusion that the use of folk-motives (or of motives in the style of folk-tunes) by a composer speaks neither in favour of nor against his creative faculties,* the best way to reach positive conclusions is to study the various manners in which composers use folk-tunes. For this purpose one need not study more than a few typical instances. If one attempted to investigate the matter from the historical point of view, one would soon find out that not merely the influence of folk-tunes, but the deliberate introduction of folk-tune is noticeable in art-music from the earliest periods to the present day; the composers who refrain from the practice or do not to an appreciable extent come under its influence being exceedingly few. So we will wonder how it can have come to pass that the point should have given rise to so much debate; but that will not help us to find replies to the many strange arguments that, on either side, are part and parcel of that debate.

Moreover, the study of the part played by folk-tune in the works of past centuries would teach us nothing that we cannot learn as well from the investigation of modern music. Indeed, the inmost logic of the facts confines our attention, in the present instance, to modern music.

The difference between folk-music and art-music (and especially academic art-music, which has reached the 'pure, abstract' stage and thence the conventional stage) is to be sought, not so much in the melodic patterns, rhythms, and other primary elements, but in the general formal, tonal and modulatory principles. Folk-music, as stated in the foregoing article, did not undergo the gradual changes through which art-music, in the hands of many teachers and of many composers, became the harbour of convention. So that the importance of the problem begins to assert itself only at the time when the influence of folk-music helped to set up a reaction against the abstract methods of conventional formalism; or, roughly, towards the middle of the 19th century (the period when the influences of Chopin, Liszt, and Glinka made themselves felt).

At the beginning, the reaction was hardly apparent; and it would have been impossible then to foresee ulterior developments. Folk-tunes were at first used as mere ornaments, quotations: insets that lent a peculiar charm of picturesqueness to a given passage, or served for some particular, temporary expressive purpose, without in the least affecting the general texture of the works in which they appeared. In some cases, compromises were attempted in order to strike a balance between the strict tonal and rhythmical schemes obtaining in art-music and the freer constitution of the folk-tune; such a practice, however, remaining exceptional, and folk-tunes being in the majority of cases selected so as not to clash too obviously with the reigning conventions.

In proportion, however, as composers felt more keenly the impulse to resort to folk-tunes, the compromise proved not only unsatisfactory in itself, but absolutely inadequate; and it could but paralyse all further progress, maintaining as it did within strict bounds the appliance of folk-motives. A number of Russians, beginning with Glinka, circumvented the difficulty very deftly; for instance, by using only a very small number of simple, though effective and fit, harmonies—a method conducive in the long run to monotony, and that soon sunk into a mere routine; the hypercritical finding, moreover, sufficient reason to aver, as M. Jean Marnold has done in the chapter devoted to Russian music in his book,

* See Musical Times, October, 1913, pp. 643-5, 'Programme Music, Folk-tune, and Progress.'

'Musique d'autrefois et d'aujourd'hui,' that 'the several constitutive elements of such music lacked fundamental affinities.' Glinka, with his admirable freshness of invention, and Borodin, with his inborn sense of harmony, avoided the pitfall; but of their followers more than one have fallen into it.

For the study of the point at issue stress should be chiefly laid on questions of tonality, harmony, and modulation. Rhythm, in high-class music, never having submitted, even during the most classical periods, to as many and as heavy restrictions, the free rhythm of modern music evolved gradually; whereas freedom of tonality and of harmony could result but from an actual revolution—a revolution whose results are not yet endorsed by the majority of art-judges.

The tonal scheme—and, as a necessary consequence, the structural scheme, founded on the principle of stereotyped tonal harmony and corresponding modulations—began to evolve from the time when folk-tunes supplied the material not merely for decorative or picturesque episodes, but for the main fabric of a work. This constitutes the second stage of evolution, a stage upon which it is necessary to dwell for a moment. There is a fundamental difference between it and the former. Folk-motives, when used as ornaments or quotations—be it even in decidedly modern, unconventional surroundings, like the old French nursery tunes in M. Debussy's 'Jardins sous la pluie,'—may be said not to affect the essence of the music. But the whole tonal scheme of a work and its structure—and this is one of the consequences of the 'laws of properties of material,' whose vital importance is admirably defined in Sir Hubert Parry's book 'Style in musical art'—are subordinate to the quality of its basic elements, the motives. As soon, therefore, as composers began to select as starting-points motives whose texture was not in accordance with the stereotyped standards in major or in minor, the whole tonal scheme began to crumble, exactly as the formal scheme—for other reasons, psychological and not material—had cracked and tottered under the hand of Beethoven.

But unwelcome as the idea may be to the upholders of certain systems, facts are ceaselessly showing that in matters of musical progress, material influences are necessary, wholesome, and resistless. Psychological, abstract causes have influenced musical form in several respects, leading to extensions and other alterations, but have hardly affected the substance to the same extent as the two concrete influences of poetic 'programmes' and of folk-song. The similarity of results, in either case, is indeed most striking; and it is for that reason that in the present articles, both problems are assimilated. Whenever a musician, guided by some tonal peculiarity in his motives, does away with certain stereotyped formal sequences in harmony or in modulation, he is acting exactly like the writer of programme music whom his poetic subject leads to overlook some law of formal symmetry in construction.

The whole principle of classical form being founded on the relationship between the fundamental harmonies (tonic, dominant, and subdominant) of a given key, and corresponding relationships between the several tonalities that appear in a piece, it stands to reason that as soon as a motive does not admit of their established functions being ascribed to each of these harmonies, the principle itself fails to work.

The chief motive of M. Vincent d'Indy's 'Symphonie sur un thème montagnard français,' for instance, does not admit of the dominant chord except quite casually, so to speak, in its final cadence. Therefore, although in the main the symphony is constructed on an altogether classical plan, its tonal atmosphere is somewhat peculiar and in many respects unprecedented; and its singularly daring modulations, which but for the peculiar constitution of the motive might at times have appeared out of keeping, sound perfectly natural.

An even more illuminative instance offers in Balakirev's 'Islamey,' whose principal motive :

of Caucasian origin, affords absolutely no room for a 'dominant' function, not even in a cadence, or in ulterior repetitions and working out. Thus, Balakirev has been able to write the whole piece without once resorting to threadbare, irksome cadences, nor to the sequences from dominants to dominants characterizing the routine that endures in the conventional forms.

A very clever and efficient use of folk-tune as the material of an elaborate composition has been made by Dr. Glazounoff in his tone-poem 'Stenka-Râzeen,' one of his best works. He has resorted to a well-known song of the Volga boatmen :

deriving his principal theme from Section A, using Section B as an episodic motive, and saving up the concluding section (not quoted) for the peroration. The masterful way in which he deals with this material deserves close study; but the question cannot be treated within the scope of the present article, and has little bearing upon the point at issue. If the motive has been quoted at length, it is because it affords another striking instance of a melody in which the leading note is neither given nor understood (the motive from d'Indy's Symphony alluded to, and the motive from 'Islamey' quoted are in the same case), and also with a view to a comparison that will presently be suggested.

The wonderful principal motive of Borodin's second Symphony may similarly be adduced:

EX. 3.

It is not an actual folk-tune, possibly, but it is absolutely in the character of old Russian epic songs (similar motives appear in Moussorgsky's 'Khovanstchina,' at the entrance of the princes, and in M. Liapounov's 'Chant Epique').

It is superfluous to explain that folk-tunes of that kind and of other kinds, besides excluding hackneyed devices, suggest novel methods of treatment in more ways than one.

Having proceeded thus far, the student will find it impossible to entertain a doubt as to the services rendered by folk-tunes. But he has now to confront an altogether new development, so recent that it is almost impossible just now to get a clear perception of its actual conditions and eventual consequences. Indeed, one would be absolutely at a loss but for the happy chance that history affords us a point of comparison which to all seeming gives us, if not positive help, at least a clue—and a warning.

'The evolution of polyphony during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance,' M. de la Laurencie tells us in his book, 'L'Histoire du Goût Musical en France,' 'divides itself into three stages. During the first, composers use as "tenor" or "cantus-firmus" a popular tune, to which the other voices associate. During the second, the "cantus-firmus" breaks up into fragments that are used as motives, for the purpose of working-out; or else, only the rhythmic scheme of the prototype is retained. The last stage is reached when musicians renounce the help of the "cantus-firmus" altogether, and invent their motives and tunes freely.'

It is not very difficult to see that among the many composers of to-day who force the most unexpected and formidable problems upon us, more than one, be it unwittingly or deliberately, has adopted exactly the same methods. But the comparative ease with which the conclusion may be reached is entirely due to the fact that we have at hand a fair amount of circumstantial evidence. Even when one is aware, for instance, that the young Hungarian composers, beginning with M. Bartok and M. Kodaly, use their national folk-tunes extensively and are strongly influenced by them, one cannot help experiencing some difficulty in seeing the connection between Hungarian folk-music as generally known (the difficulty is also increased by the fact that one usually knows not Hungarian, but Gipsy music) and the achievements of these composers. A precious help is afforded by M. Bartok's books of easy pianoforte pieces for children, containing arrangements of actual known Hungarian folk-tunes, and arrangements whose similarity, in style and spirit, to his more elaborate works can be seen at a glance. I shall content myself with adducing two short extracts in which the part played by the folk-tune as a cantus-firmus, a framework for musical invention, is in my opinion particularly obvious:

EX. 4.

BARTOK, 'Pro Dèti' (Rosznyai, Budapest), No. 23.

Another remarkable case is afforded by Mr. Cyril Scott's 'Old songs in new guise,'—of which a review appeared in the August issue of the Musical Times.

Let it be briefly remarked that the comparison, even if sound in principle, may be of little practical avail except, I repeat it, as a possible clue and an obvious warning to us not to judge rashly. The fact of folk-tunes being used thus makes the music in itself neither worse nor better.

Of course, many will ask whether such methods are legitimate. To which query the only answer is, that all that music can do well it does legitimately—the question whether it does a given thing well being one that time alone solves. And recourse to strange dissonances, strange relationships between parts, is nowadays noticeable, not only in the works of a few composers who make extensive use of folk-tunes, but in those of many artists belonging to different schools and countries.

In M. Igor Stravinsky's 'Sacre du Printemps,' for example, familiarity with the idiom of Russian folk-song helps us to see that we have to deal with something not unlike M. de la Laurencie's second stage of evolution, in which the cantus firmus (here, the folk-tunes) breaks up so as to supply the motives, the syllables of the musical discourse. Here is an example, the upper notes of which should be compared with Ex. No. 2, above:

BARTOK, 'A Gyrmeknek' (ib.), No. 39.

EX. 6.

(alone, it may fail to carry conviction; but three score and more could be adduced).

When composers upon whom the influence of folk-tune is absolutely indiscernible, like M. Schönberg and his disciples, have taken to using similar musical effects; when these effects are in daily use among many composers who cannot have reacted upon one another, it is perhaps too late to pretend to shrug one's shoulders at it. With or without the help of folk-song, the new idiom has appeared. Whether we like it or not, whether we incline or not to endorse it on principle, we cannot overlook the fact that it is there. And perhaps the day is not far distant when theorists will present us with its systematic syntax and its code of rules in compressed form. For the present, I can but leave the student on the threshold of his own investigations.

GIUSEPPE VERDI.

BORN OCTOBER 10, 1813.

DIED JANUARY 27, 1901.

In our issue for March, 1901, we printed an article by Joseph Bennett on the life-work of Italy's master-musician, and we gave a portrait of the composer, reproduced from the last photograph that was taken before his death. We need not now again go over the details of Verdi's eventful life, but we are glad, on the occasion of the centenary year of his birth, to be able to give appreciations of the composer contributed by two well-known critics.

THE VERDIAN EVOLUTION.

BY HERMANN KLEIN.

It is a question whether the moment has yet arrived for a conclusive estimate of Verdi's achievements. His life was a full one. It began a hundred years ago last month; it reached its peaceful close a dozen years ago last January. The perspective is lengthy and crowded. It requires yet greater distance for a true appreciation of its detail. Time and posterity alone can decide, once for all, the things concerning which contemporary 'doctors' have agreed to disagree: for example, Verdi's place among the Great Masters, the relative value of his works, the real lasting calibre of operas which are still as popular to-day as when they first leapt into fame.

On one point, however, mere lapse of time will not help us to a more accurate discernment of the truth than we can attain now. That point is the actual nature of the evolution in Verdi's so-called 'styles,' and the influence or influences under which such evolution took place. Here, perhaps, we shall find a better ground for unanimity of idea than many writers were displaying during the closing decade of the composer's lifetime. Strong differences of opinion were then expressed on this important subject. Some would have it that Verdi owed his development solely to his own genius; that it came entirely from within. Others attributed it largely—especially in its later phases—to the influence of Wagner. On the other hand one authority, who has perhaps been vouchsafed undue prominence by the permanent record of his judgment in the pages of Grove's 'Dictionary,' went so far as to declare his complete inability to recognise the three different styles or 'manners' which other people had discovered in Verdi's operas.

I shall not stay to discuss this dictum of the late Giannandrea Mazzucato (whom I knew as a modest and otherwise able writer), beyond expressing surprise that it was not eliminated, together with certain other features which disappeared from his article on Verdi in the revised edition of 'Grove.' Just as well might one deny the evidence of the 'three manners' of Beethoven as refuse to recognise the existence of Verdi's. In the stages from 'Oberto di Bonifacio' to 'La Battaglia di Legnano'; from 'Luisa Miller' to 'Don Carlos'; from 'Aida' to 'Falstaff,' are comprised three groups of styles, with their intervening transition periods, as plainly distinguishable as the cross upon St. Paul's on a clear day. But Mazzucato was inclined to be myopic.

On Verdi's eighty-seventh birthday (and his last) the whole of his magnificent career was traced with a master hand in the columns of the Daily Telegraph by the late Joseph Bennett, who refused to admit that the change to the great Italian's 'third manner' was mainly owing to the influence of Wagner. Nor did he consider the influence to be the outcome of either the study or the unconscious imitation of Wagner's methods. 'No doubt,' he wrote, 'Verdi was affected by the general atmosphere of change, but the results, so far as he himself was concerned, were entirely his own . . . The aged master's latest works are in spirit and character no less Italian than their predecessors, and they are entirely lacking in the features which distinguish the productions of the famous German composer. Even the orchestral music, to which we always look for signs of Wagnerian domination—even that is all Verdi.'

This may have been perfectly true. Nevertheless, it is not to be denied that the 'general atmosphere of change' had been largely created by Wagner himself, and no one else. Bennett argued that the fact of the changes wrought by the Bayreuth master having synchronised with those revealed in the later Verdi development did not necessarily prove that Wagner caused them. True, again; but no one who remembers the impression created by 'Aida' when it first came out can forget what it suggested to the critics of the period. One of them, Ernest Reyer, a Frenchman, who was also a composer moving with the times, exclaimed: 'Ah! let no one say now "M. Verdi lives in the most perfect isolation, and remains absolutely indifferent to every new work, to every new system. . . ." I am perfectly certain that the works of Richard Wagner are familiar to him, and equally so those of Berlioz. He must also have studied just a little the scores of Meyerbeer, and have made himself acquainted with what Gounod has done, which is not always on the surface.' His studies in these different styles were perhaps only rough sketches when he wrote "Don Carlos"; at present they are far advanced, if not absolutely complete. And if he persist in his new style, the maestro Verdi, although some of his enthusiastic admirers may become cool, will work many conversions and make many disciples, even in those exclusive circles which hitherto have scarcely recognised him.'

Verdi did persist, and with important consequences alike to himself and the art of his country. The 'Manzoni' Requiem, a masterpiece that will live so long as there is music on earth, followed quickly upon 'Aida.' Sixteen years later came 'Otello,' another great landmark upon the road of advancement; and six years after that 'Falstaff,' a comic opera not unworthy to be ranked in its way with 'Die Meistersinger.' But with the advent of 'Aida' the so-called conversions anticipated by Reyer had already begun. They started with Arrigo Boito and 'Mefistofele,' with Ponchiello and 'La Gioconda,' who between them laid the foundations of the Young Italy school of to-day, the school of Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Puccini, and Wolff-Ferrari.

All controversy, however, as to the immediate influences that may or may not have affected Verdi in his artistic evolution is of secondary importance compared with the fact itself, and the wonderful internal manifestation of steady growth which his works afford. He learned his best lessons from his early failures, which were pretty evenly distributed among his early successes. Having gained the ear of the public with operas like 'Nabucco,' 'I Lombardi,' and 'Ernani,' he began to perceive that there was something lacking in the form and character of the model upon which he was working. He grew tired of realism, he attached no value to the political meaning which his countrymen read into his settings of certain lines and therewith roused themselves to fine frenzies of delight. He sought to create for himself loftier ideals.

He did not succeed all at once. During the five years that elapsed between 'Ernani' and 'Luisa Miller' he brought out no fewer than eight operas, including the one ('I Masnadieri') founded upon Schiller's 'Räuber,' which he wrote specially for Her Majesty's Theatre and came to London to produce. These were all more or less failures. Then Verdi blossomed forth into his second manner, to which belong, of course, 'Rigoletto,' 'Il Trovatore,' and 'La Traviata.' We smile to-day when the thought of higher ambitions and nobler artistic ideals is associated with these operas, now hackneyed until they have become threadbare. Yet to do so is perchance to forget two things: first, the unquestionable advance that they mark in the development of Verdi's technical resource, together with his capacity for refined and appropriate expression; and, secondly, the possibility that these very operas may still live and retain their popularity as long as any that have issued from the same pen.

At any rate, we can perceive in them the unmistakable traces of the true Verdi—those marks of individuality which he bears with him to the end. They overflow once more in the 'Ballo in Maschera,' 'Les Vêpres Siciliennes' (written for Paris), and 'Don Carlos.' But all these efforts reveal the inward striving after higher things; they are so many stepping-stones to the attainment of that last glorious summit wherein Verdi raised his third temple to the Muse of Opera. That he evolved it from his own design, and built it wholly out of his own material and from his own inspiration I, for one, cannot doubt, any more than I can question that posterity will always regard it as the noblest temple of the three.

VERDI AND POLITICS.

BY F. BONAVIA.

The trouble Verdi had on many occasions with the police censorship the Austrians had established in Italy has given rise to the idea that he was a great patriot. There is no doubt that Verdi sympathised wholeheartedly with the general trend of the political movement of his day in Italy, but at the same time it would be erroneous to suppose that he deliberately set out to defy 'the barbarians.' In any case, as the authorities could only object to the words of the operas, the librettist, rather than the composer, should be held responsible for any display of patriotism. The only proof we have of Verdi's feelings on the subject of the treatment of his operas by the police is his stubborn opposition to any amendment in accordance with their commands. In the end he had to give way often enough, but the mere fact of his having defied the police made him a hero with the patriots. At the same time the situation in Italy was such that unless one was absolutely hand in glove with the foreigner it was hardly possible not to give umbrage to the suspicious authorities. The methods by which the Austrians tried to hold the Italian provinces are now matter of history. Their treatment of Verdi is typical. The dramatists of the time, Ferrari, Giacometti, when they chose a patriotic subject made straight for their goal without attempting to hide their end, and one can well understand why the police forbade the performance of some of their works. But in the case of Verdi the prohibition appears not only unjustifiable but even devoid of common-sense.

Let us consider some of the operas which were barred, and the reasons given for the censoring.

The subject of 'Nabucco' would seem as remote from politics as it well could be, yet a single line, 'Oh my country, so lovely and yet lost,' inspired the police agents with such fear that to this day the performance of the opera is forbidden in the Italian provinces of Austria. 'Ernani,' on which the police ban still rests, is based on the well-known play by Victor Hugo. In this a chorus beginning with the words which, roughly translated, run: 'May the lion of Castile awake again,—we will fight with our arms and our hearts—as of old against the tyrant Moors'—proved the bone of contention. The 'Lion of Castile' evidently could not deceive the Austrians. Lions have ever been the bugbear of the Slav police. The Lion of St. Mark has been the subject of many jokes not always witty though often bitter. 'Your lion is dead' said the Austrian to the Venetian. 'He is only sleeping after too big a meal,' replied the Venetian, 'you had better clear out before he wakes again, because he will be very hungry.' Only a short time ago a wall in Monfalcone which bore the emblem of the Venetian Republic was pulled down for no apparent reason.

It must be said that the chorus in 'Ernani' to which the police took exception was the culminating point of a conspiracy against Charles V. of Spain, and possibly its presentation on the stage might have been suspected of encouraging the conspiracies then being hatched all over Italy. Even less clear is the case of 'Attila' which, when first performed, created such a furore that the theatre benches were smashed to pieces by the demonstrators, and the opera was accordingly nicknamed 'Attila, the scourge of the benches.'

The subject of 'Attila' is, of course, the historic episode at Chalons when the Roman general, Ætius, succeeded in stemming the advance of the Huns. In the duet between the commanders, Ætius puts his requests very modestly. 'Keep thou the Universe,' he says to Attila, 'Leave Italy to me.'

It is very evident that if the police were extremely suspicious of everybody and everything, the Italians were equally ready to see allusions to their own conditions in the most innocent remarks that were made on the stage. The only possible way of preventing such demonstrations would have been to close all the theatres. Sometimes the prohibition of an opera was withdrawn, thanks to stratagems of childish ingenuity. The Archbishop of Milan, for instance, objected to the opera 'I Lombardi' on the ground of its irreverence. The Archbishop's scruples were overcome, however, by changing 'Ave Maria' to 'Salve Maria.' In 'Rigoletto,' the plot is taken from Victor Hugo's 'Le Roi s'amuse,' and one can easily understand that a story which relates in no ambiguous terms the adventures of a libertine prince would be unacceptable to those in authority, but it is less easy to understand why it should have been allowed to pass after the hero had been changed from Francis the First to a Duke of Mantua. Most people of average culture must have known the book from which the plot was drawn, and the opposition could only induce them to look for allusions where none were intended. It stands to reason that 'Les Vêpres Siciliennes' was scowled upon; an opera representing the massacre of the French invaders at the hands of the Sicilians being tantamount to a glorification of revolution. But why was it necessary in 'Un Ballo in Maschera' to rename the hero (Gustavus III.) Richard, and make him a Governor of Boston?

Considering the state of Italy at the time, it will be seen that Verdi, though unquestionably in warm sympathy with the movement for the unity of Italy, was one of the men who had patriotism thrust upon them. On the other hand, his music —popular in character and fiery—was admirably fitted to serve as a battle song for the masses. Time has shorn the earlier Verdian operas of most of their glory; but this buoyancy, this rude strength, still remains to them, and is the one reason why they are not yet entirely forgotten.

COMPOSITIONS BY VERDI.

Operas, in chronological order.

- Rocester—2 Acts (Piazza). Composed about 1836 for Parma. Manuscript lost.
- Oberto conte di San Bonifacio—2 Acts (Romani). La Scala, Milan, November 18, 1839.
- Un giorno di regno or Il finto Stanislao—2 Acts (Romani). La Scala, Milan, September 5, 1840.
- Nabucco—4 Acts (Solera). La Scala, Milan, March 9, 1842.
- I Lombardi alla prima crociata—4 Acts (Solera). La Scala, Milan, February 11, 1843.
- Ernani—4 Acts (Piave). Théâtre Fenice, Venice, March 9, 1844.
- I due Foscari—3 Acts (Piave). Théâtre Argentina, Rome, October 3, 1844.
- Giovanna d'Arco—3 Acts (Solera). La Scala, Milan, February 15, 1845.
- Alzira—3 Acts (Cammarano). San Carlo, Naples, August 12, 1845.
- Attila—3 Acts (Solera). Théâtre Fenice, Venice, March 17, 1846.
- Macbeth—4 Acts (Piave). La Pergola, Florence, March 14, 1847.
- I Masnadieri—4 Acts (Maffei). Drury Lane, London, July 22, 1847.
- Jerusalem—4 Acts (I Lombardi, revised and augmented) (Royer and Vaéz). Académie Royale, Paris, November 26, 1847.
- Il Corsaro—4 Acts (Piave). Grand Théâtre, Trieste, October 25, 1848.
- La Battaglia di Legnano—3 Acts (Cammarano). Argentina, Rome, January 27, 1849.
- Luisa Miller—3 Acts (Cammarano). San Carlo, Naples, December 8, 1849.
- Stiffelio—3 Acts (Piave). Grand Théâtre, Trieste, November 16, 1850.
- Rigoletto—3 Acts (Piave). Théâtre Fenice, Venice, March 11, 1851.
- Il Trovatore—4 Acts (Cammarano). Apollo, Rome, January 19, 1853.
- La Traviata—3 Acts (Piave). Théâtre Fenice, Venice, March 6, 1853.
- Les Vêpres Siciliennes—5 Acts (Scribe and Duveyrier). Grand Opéra, Paris, June 13, 1855.
- Simone Boccanegra—3 Acts (Piave). Théâtre Fenice, Venice, March 12, 1857.
- Aroldo—4 Acts (Piave). Nouveau Théâtre, Rimini, August 16, 1857.
- Un Ballo in Maschera—4 Acts. Apollo, Rome, February 17, 1859.
- La Forza del Destino—4 Acts (Piave). Théâtre Impériale, Petersburg, November 10, 1862.
- Macbeth—4 Acts (Piave), revised. Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, April 21, 1865.
- Don Carlos—5 Acts (Mery and Du Locle). Grand Opéra, Paris, March 11, 1867.
- Aida—4 Acts (Ghislanzoni and Du Locle). Théâtre Italien, Cairo, December 24, 1871.
- Otello—4 Acts (Boito). La Scala, Milan, February 5, 1887.
- Falstaff—3 Acts (Boito). La Scala, Milan, February 9, 1893.

VOCAL WORKS.

- Messa da Requiem (in memoriam Alessandro Manzoni). Chiesa di San Marco, Milan, May 22, 1874.
- Pater Noster, Ave Maria, after Dante, for chorus S.S.A.T.B. La Scala, Milan, April 18, 1880.
- Ave Maria, Laudi alla beata Virgine (Dante), Stabat Mater, Te Deum. Quattri pezzi sacri for four voices. Turin, 1899.

Wedding Cantata—composed about 1834.

Inno delle Nazioni. Composed for the London Exhibition and performed at Her Majesty's Theatre, May 24, 1862.

Six romances: Non t'accostare all'urna, More, Elisa, In solitaria stanza, Nell'orrida di notte oscura, Perduta ho la pace, Deh pietosa.

Album of six songs: Il tramonto, La Zingara, Ad una stella, Lo Spazzacamino, Il mistero, Brindisi.

Il Poveretto. Romanzo.

Tu dici che non m'ami. Stornello.

L'esule, La Seduzione. For bass.

Guarda che bianca luna. Notturno for soprano, tenor, and bass, with flute obbligato.

INSTRUMENTAL WORKS.

String quartet, written at Naples and performed at the composer's house, April 1, 1873.

Symphonies, Overtures, Marches for orchestra and military band, written 1833-36, not published.

Occasional Notes.

We share the universal regret of the nation that the Right Hon. Lord Alverstone, G.C.M.G., has on account of ill-health resigned the exalted position he held as Lord Chief Justice. We also desire to share in the congratulations on the honour that has been paid to His Lordship by His Majesty The King in making him a Viscount. We trust that Viscount Alverstone will long continue to find that satisfaction and recreation in the practice of the Art of Music which he has enjoyed in the past, and that he will still be able to give that valued support to musical movements by which he has on so many occasions earned the gratitude of the musical profession.

One of the best signs of musical grace in Wales is to be found in the ferment that is developing over the proposal to form a Welsh National College of Music. Although various meetings and discussions have been held, nothing very definite has so far emerged, but at least there is evidence of a strong desire on the part of many earnest and influential persons to devise ways and means that may lead to national musical progress.

At present Aberystwyth and Cardiff University Colleges have organized departments of music. At Cardiff diploma and degree courses have been established, and there are choral and orchestral Societies rehearsing weekly under the able direction of Prof. David Evans. Similar work on a smaller scale is being carried on at Aberystwyth under Prof. David Jenkins. Recently a new departure has placed music at Bangor College on a hopeful footing, Mr. Harry Evans, who is one of the forward school, having been placed in authority. But the question is whether at these three centres it is possible to provide the gifted sons and daughters of Wales with that formative musical environment which will enable them to develop all their potentialities. As it is, many young Welsh students come to the Royal Academy and the Royal College of Music. Is it likely that the isolated Welsh University Colleges can offer anything to equal the advantages afforded by these institutions, which, of course, draw their students from the whole Empire? It may be that generous support of the three University Colleges is for the present the most practicable course, but we fear it will not arouse enthusiasm. In the end a purely musical institution, well-equipped, and independent of outside control and of fluctuating opinion, must be regarded as the goal and the only rational solution of the problem. The Welsh nation owes it to itself to make the most of its musical genius.

Early in October the musical world learned with dismay that the Denhof opera tour, of which so much had been heard, was broken off suddenly at Manchester owing to lack of support there and elsewhere. It seemed that this fine company was to be disbanded. But in a few days it was announced that Mr. Beecham, ubiquitous and enterprising as ever, would take the business in hand: and we are glad to record that he has done so with great success. The threat of abandonment has spurred on musical amateurs to show their appreciation of opera.

Apropos the performances of the Denhof (now Beecham) Opera Company, we are informed in a provincial paper that:

Mr. Schilling-Ziemssen's reading of the Overture was that of Richter intensified. Every demisemiquaver in the score stood clearly alone. Every phrase, every theme was distinct, while the perfection of instrumental blending afforded the fullest measure of delight to the student and the mere lover of opera alike. The conductor inspired his choral and his orchestral forces, and obtained effects of expression and delicacy and thunderous fortissimos with the strength of a commander who knows the skill and resource of his battalions. What is generally a weak department in 'The Flying Dutchman,' the horn part, was treated with such skill as to be among the most enjoyable of the features.

We are glad the opera went so nicely. We trust that the quavers and the dotted crotchets also stood out clearly; but we resent the words 'the mere lover of opera,'—as though he did not count!

We remind our readers that on the day when this journal is published Mr. Raymond Roze's opera season commences at Covent Garden. The first opera to be mounted will be Mr. Roze's 'Joan of Arc,' which will be given for the first time on any stage. The particulars available at the time of going to press are as follows: the répertoire contains, besides 'Joan of Arc,' Wagner's 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin' and 'Tristan and Isolde,' Bizet's 'Carmen' in a new translation by Mr. Hermann Klein, Gounod's 'Faust' in a new translation by Mr. Alfred Kalisch, Humperdinck's 'Hänsel and Gretel' and a ballet 'Narkiss, the Golden Prince.' The conductors and 'Masters of Music' are Mr. Michael Balling, Mr. Hamilton Harty, Mr. Frank Bridge, and Mr. Julius Harrison. It is good to see Englishmen among the responsible workers, and a good proportion of English names among the artists. It will be a large feather in Mr. Roze's cap if he wins success in this venture based on native talent, especially after the recent disaster to England's growing repute as a home of opera. It is announced that during his season Mr. Roze will give Sunday evening Wagner concerts at the Opera House.

The prospectus of the Classical Concert Society's autumn season of ten chamber concerts at Bechstein Hall gives details of some very interesting programmes. Much of the music, as is consistent with the name of the Society, is familiar, but it is the familiarity that is won by greatness, and the names of the artists who are to present it promise that perfection which can never lose its novelty. The first two concerts are dealt with in our London Concerts column, and the third—a Brahms concert, with the Rosé Quartet—will have taken place (October 29) by the time these notes appear. The Rosé Quartet again come forward on November 5. On November 12 Mlle. Jane Bathori-Engel and Mr. Leonard Borwick, and on November 19 Mr. Borwick and the Misses Harrison, will appear. The Klingler Quartet will be heard on November 26, and again, joined by the London String Quartet for the performance of Mendelssohn's Octet, on December 3. Mr. Gervase Elwes, on December 10, is to sing Dr. R. Vaughan Williams's admirable song-cycle 'On Wenlock Edge,' with the London String Quartet, and Mr. Percy Grainger will also assist. At the last concert, on December 17, M. Maurice Ravel is expected to be present to accompany Miss Rhoda von Glehn in his own songs, and to hear his famous Quartet in F performed by the English String Quartet. It remains to add that the terms of subscription to these concerts have been reduced.

The report of the twenty-seventh season of the South Place Sunday Popular Concerts is again striking evidence of enthusiasm and activity in the cause of music. A district that knows not music on working days gives forth every Sunday, during the autumn and winter season, a chamber concert of the highest class. Only well-known players and singers are engaged there. At the twenty-two concerts of the 1912-13 season the works performed included eight pianoforte trios, four pianoforte quartets, eleven string quartets, ten quintets for various combinations, a sextet, a septet, a double quartet, and an octet (Svendsen's). The programmes of the first few concerts of the present season are the beginnings of a similar record. Admission is free to the unreserved seats and cheap to the reserved seats, so that the organization needs all the support it deserves.

The concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society at the Queen's Hall on the evening of Tuesday, November 4, with which the Royal Philharmonic Society inaugurate their hundred and third season, should prove to be one of the most interesting of the year. The programme includes the first performance in England of Strauss's 'Festliches Praeludium,' composed for the opening of the new Concert Hall of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna on October 18. In composing it, Strauss aimed at producing something midway between the 'Jubel Overture' of Weber, and the Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger.' For the carrying out of the intentions of the composer it will be necessary to employ an orchestra of 150, of whom a hundred will be string players. Those who have seen the new work speak of its melodiousness and comparative simplicity. The conductor of the concert is Mengelberg, who is specially intimate with Strauss and well acquainted with his intentions. The hundred string players will also be employed in Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris.' The other orchestral numbers include Wagner's 'Huldigungs-Marsch,' and Beethoven's fifth Symphony. Señor Manen will play Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' and Madame Kirkby Lunn will be the vocalist of the evening.

Sir Henry J. Wood has resigned the position of conductor of the Sheffield Triennial Festival, which he has held since 1902.

In an article in a contemporary on 'Good vocal attack,' Madame Tetrassini leads off by saying, 'Do not attack a note at the same time that you are inhaling. That is too soon.' It is. Indeed, until we can have a kind of supplementary shaft added to our present windpipe—an emergency exit, as it were—we are not likely to commit this grievous error.

JOHANN MÄTTHESEN.

By JEFFREY PULVER.

'Old Squabbler, Dandy, Charlatan, Word-Juggler, and many other similar titles of honour are bestowed, in the histories of music, in biographies, and in the writings of celebrated representatives of the modern musical art, upon the man, who, after a closer study of his nature, endeavours, and activities, gave me the courage to attempt to win for him the just appreciation that I conscientiously feel myself compelled to accord him.' These are the words with which Ludwig Meinardus opened his discourse* on Johann Mattheson in 1874, and they are the words that I should have employed unconsciously had I not first read Meinardus's work. That Mattheson has been gracefully underrated is certain; for I know of no German contemporary of Handel or Bach whose labours more vividly give back the period at which he worked, or whose endeavours towards the improvement of the state of music bore such good and lasting fruit as those of Johann Mattheson. Although his compositions have been ridiculed by more than one popular writer, and his character woefully misread by most, I think it will only be necessary to regard him and his work in the light of his own period, to compare him with his contemporaries, and to examine his motives before condemning his results, and we must come to the inevitable conclusion that in Johann Mattheson we see one of the greatest forces in 18th-century music, one of the pillars upon which a pure musical style could be founded, and one of the pioneers in the war against prejudice, charlatanism, and hide-bound convention. Apostles of progress are never likely to be much beloved of their contemporaries, and when the fashion of public quarrelling in this age of pamphlet wars is added, we can easily see how Mattheson obtained his epithet of 'Old Squabbler.' Was he more quarrelsome than those about him?—I do not think so. In the age that beheld Mattheson the polemical style was the favourite one; we know that the most elementary discussions were developed into wars of great bitterness in open letters, pamphlets, and often in bulky volumes; when Mattheson used these means he was not proving himself to be excessively snappish, but it showed only that he was content to fight his world with the accepted weapons of that world. And when Moritz Hauptmann called the Hamburger an 'alter Disputax' he evidently forgot for the moment that everyone disputed everything in that period of the 'rule of Reason.'

How frequently has Mattheson been accused of pedantry! Did not his detractors know that the age of the Grand Encyclopédie was one in which not to be 'learned' was a sure passport to the wall? Which author of that era could afford to go to press without a rich collection of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, and English quotations liberally scattered throughout his pages? Was Mattheson an exception? No; but he was also by no means the worst of the rule. To look at the 18th century through the eyes of the 19th and 20th is to obtain a very distorted view. The 'Zopf' was the sign of artificiality, of flattery, of sensitiveness, of affectation, and of hasty passions; but Mattheson's rapier leapt out of its scabbard no faster than did that of the least of his slighted contemporaries. How much has been written and debated upon the famous duel with Handel! Is it worth it? Is it not sufficient to set it down as the result of a hasty quarrel between friends who immediately afterwards 'made it up' again?

* Published in 'Sammlung Musikalischer Vorträge.' B. & H., 1879.

So far I have sought to excuse where others have uncompromisingly blamed; let us now look upon the other side of the canvas. Certain of Mattheson's most biased critics still show signs of possessing some slight sense of justice where his merits are concerned; 'an untiring and thorough worker' says one, and spoils it by adding 'half-charlatan, half-learned.' The falsehood of the first 'half' is easily laid bare by his intensely fervent defence of the musical art against everyone and everything likely to lower its divinely high standard. In the introduction to his 'Musicalische Patriot' he says: 'Music is the science and the art of putting harmonic intervals so skilfully together, and of reproducing them so pleasingly, that it should, by varied sounds and movements, occasion a euphony that can raise the human heart to virtue and to the praise of the Most High, after God's own will, grace, and command.' Does this sound like the affected prating or the bombastic advertisement of a charlatan? And that he was more than 'half-learned' will be seen later when we arrive at pure biography. But while on the topic of music in its relation to religion, I should like to refute another favourite statement of Mattheson's calumniators. This is the charge that his religion was a pose, and that his daily reading of some chapters of the Scriptures a self-swindling artifice. It would require turpitude even greater than is human to keep up such a pretence throughout so long a life as was Mattheson's. 'Music is a possession of the Church, and is only for God-fearing and virtuous people: let each one give to God that which is God's,' says he; and it is in music that he seeks true happiness. He writes: 'Many have gorged themselves to death; and I add also drunk themselves into the grave; debauchery is mourning for the heart. . . . Quelle est la vie d'un homme, vaincu par le vin? Nothing; these things have nothing to do with our happiness.' Is all this to be construed into proof of aught but a noble character? Many have said that he was dishonest in his dealings because he was dishonest with himself. In all his work I find signs of the contrary. Ever introspective, he knew that the only way of convincing others of the soundness of his precepts was to live them first—as motto to his 'Plus Ultra' he uses Milton's line: 'The best ingredient of a good writer is that of being an honest man.' Nevertheless, it will not be possible to deny that there were traces of vanity in his constitution; but it is also possible to find excuse for it. Mattheson's higher education was self-acquired. High honours were heaped upon him, and if some self-appreciation on their account must pass by the names of egoism and vanity, let it pass as such; but let us not forget to honour him for his having made of himself the man of learning he undoubtedly was. And Cyril von Wich, whose table companion he was for many years at the English Embassy, described him as the most modest of men. Even in his writings his findings are always either based upon the then accepted authorities, chapter and verse being invariably quoted, or else he substantiates his own decisions with evidence that is generally entirely conclusive. Egoism finds little space in his work—rather the contrary—for in some of his cleverest publications he intimates that his intention was merely to strike the key-note and leave the working-out to 'other and better men.'

What has gone before may give some idea of the character of the man whose life-story follows. The reader of much that has hitherto been written of Mattheson must lose by the jaundiced views generally expressed; even Chrysander sinned in this respect, and allowed his avowed hero-worship of his deity Handel to permit prejudice against the Hamburger musician and reformer to take deep root. It is worse than folly in us to allow a slander that is surely old enough to die to overshadow the good work done by a man who, unfortunately for himself, had the moral courage to say what he thought and fling it in the teeth of those who made up the petty circle of cavillers and carpers about him.

Born at Hamburg on September 28, 1681, Johann Mattheson enjoyed advantages that did not fall to the lot of every prospective musician. The son of a revenue official in comfortable circumstances, he never knew the struggles against poverty of a Leopold Mozart; possessing an iron constitution, further strengthened by every athletic pursuit, he combated illness and withstood the strain of overwork with remarkable ease. The home-life of Johann was pure, simple, and happy; his childhood was spent in an atmosphere of religion not marred by bigotry. Doted upon by his parents and friends, he ran a grave risk of becoming a spoiled child, a circumstance that gave most of his later slanderers the excuse for accusing him of conceit; for, they argued, a spoiled child could grow up into nought but a vain man. Showing signs of musical talent in his seventh year, he was warmly encouraged in the study by his parents (although his father had at first destined him for the law), and he was given every advantage of tuition. For each of five instruments—organ, clavier, flute, oboe, and viola da gamba—for composition, and in singing, he had a special teacher, and it seems that his early general education was rather neglected on that account. He certainly did attend the Johanneum, but most of the higher education he enjoyed—his profound knowledge of statecraft and diplomacy, of foreign languages and histories, of the classic authors of Judæa, Greece, and Rome—was all self-acquired. Later on, to preserve his mental and physical balance, he indulged in all kinds of exercises and sports, and while his mind was being stocked with a most heterogeneous collection of subjects, his body was also being trained in riding, dancing, and fencing.

Little Johann was but nine years old when his father made a last attempt to interest him in the study of law. To this end the boy was sent to a couple of lectures in jurisprudence. The effect of such discourses on a child may be imagined. The looked-for interest did not come, and although he later studied the subject very deeply, he was from that moment allowed to pursue music to his heart's content. Although still a schoolboy, some compositions of his were performed with much success at concerts and church, and, indeed, he seemed unusually precocious; his voice was described as a 'pure and beautiful treble,' and besides his skill in writing, he could play the harpsichord very well. On his return home from school it was his wont to instruct pupils of his own age, and we see his love for uninterrupted work evident thus early. His voice soon gained him admission into the chorus of the Hamburg Opera, which was then in a most flourishing state, and when the company played at Kiel he was promoted to sing name-roles in female character in opera, which the good Hamburgers still called by its old-fashioned name of Singspiel: this was in 1696 and 1697. He was only nineteen years of age when he wrote and produced his first opera, 'Die Pleiaden.' By this time his voice had broken to become a Heldentenor, and in his first production he sustained the chief rôle himself, adding to this duty the then not unusual ones of conductor and harpsichordist. Thence onward many other operas followed until his diplomatic duties prevented his appearance on the stage. Even then he continued to write in this form for his own pleasure, for many of his later works he did not even attempt to have produced.

His fame had by this time travelled, and offers of positions as organist came from Lübeck (1703) and Haarlem (1704), only to be declined, in spite of the large salaries attached to them. His reasons for refusing these offers are not clear, but he may have had some inkling of the regard in which he was held by Johann von Wich, the representative in the British interest in that part of Germany, and father of one of his pupils. If he was speculating upon an ultimate appointment at this Embassy his hopes were speedily fulfilled, for his alert brain and knowledge of languages and of international law caused von Wich to draw Mattheson closer to the service. With this end in view the diplomat engaged him—first as tutor to his son (1705), and later as secretary in the secret service department. Now began Mattheson's busiest times. Occupied with his pupils, his secretaryship, and the numerous and important missions upon which he was sent, he still found time to play, compose, and write treatises on various musical subjects; and more than his talent must be admired his amazing industry and versatility.

Being now in a settled position, he married, in 1709, Catherine Jennings, the daughter of an English clergyman. His matrimonial life, according to the writings of his contemporaries, was very happy, but no heir to Mattheson's talents and fortune blessed the union.

The death of Johann von Wich shifted the responsibilities of the ambassadorial post on to Mattheson's shoulders until what time his quondam pupil, Cyril von Wich, was of an age to assist him; so, as time went on, we see signs of always greater industry and activity. The enormous amount of diplomatic writing that he had to get through did not, however, prevent him from composing a Serenade to honour the accession of George I. to the throne of England.

But new work was soon added. In 1715 he was invested in the Directorate of the Hamburg Cathedral, and in other honours of a similar nature. They were not sinecures: a huge number of compositions for the organ and chorus, oratorios, and other sacred works, testify how seriously he took his posts; and when in 1719 the Duke of Holstein offered him the Capellmeistership of the Ducal Band, Mattheson accepted it together with the large salary attached, and found time for that work also. But the only physical defect from which he ever suffered—an ear affection—now began to grow worse, and in 1728 he was compelled to relinquish his many musical pursuits and content himself with writing on the subjects he loved so well. Zedler, writing in 1739, says: 'He is still living, right merry, and industrious in State affairs and music.' From the moment of his retirement from the field of practical music he set himself the task of issuing books on almost every branch of the art. These must be left for treatment on another occasion. He died, very wealthy, in 1764.

When we review Mattheson's work—both musical and literary—the first thing that strikes us is not so much the genius it proves (for Mattheson undoubtedly possessed both genius and talent, in spite of the disparaging remarks contained in Grove, and others who copied)—not so much its apparent genius, I say, as its revolutionary tendency. Mattheson thought the worship of the Italian Maestro di Cappella and the aping of the music of Versailles had gone on long enough, and he was determined to give the newly-awakened German talent some material untainted by foreign influence to work upon. And if foreign influence was his most mobile enemy, the 'dry bony hands' of the ultra 'learned' and of the academics raised forts against which he thundered volume upon volume. As one of the greatest forces that assured the progress of music in 18th-century Germany, Johann Mattheson is a man worthy of the most serious study;—and we, who read our Jahn, our Spitta, and our Chrysander, and take a vicarious pride in the achievements of the great ones, should feel a deep sensation of shame that we neglect him who undoubtedly removed many obstacles from, and combated many of the evils that beset, the path which led towards musical advancement.

MR. WILLIAM LUDWIG'S BENEFIT PERFORMANCE.

Sir Herbert Tree has generously granted the use of His Majesty's Theatre, on December 8, for the benefit of Mr. William Ludwig, formerly principal baritone of the Carl Rosa Company. Mr. W. Ludwig was well known as a fine artist whose impersonations of 'The Flying Dutchman' and other prominent rôles were famous in London and the provinces. The programme of the matinée is yet in the making, but it is known that—among others—Miss Violet Vanbrugh, Miss Marie Tempest, Sir Herbert Tree, Mr. Arthur Bouchier, Mr. George Grossmith, Miss Florence Smithson, Mr. Barclay Gammon, and Mr. Maurice Farkoa, have kindly given their services. On the part of the musical profession, Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Margaret Cooper, and Mr. Ben Davies have already consented to appear. A full list of artists will be given in our next issue. Meanwhile we hope that this benevolent scheme in favour of a distinguished singer will be whole-heartedly supported.

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

II. OF ENGLISH ORGAN MUSIC.

The compleat organist will be ever ready to deal a stout blow on behalf of his art, even if the recoil should inflict a nasty bruise on his popularity. This is a commonplace, and therefore can hardly be repeated too often. The striking of stout blows is usually an interesting affair; in this case it will be a comparatively dull one. It will mean frequent sacrifice of popular success, and the hero will not even have the consoling pleasure of feeling that he is cutting an heroic figure. So far from that, indeed, he may sometimes find a discerning public calling him a dull dog for his pains.

In what department of his work will an organist find most frequent opportunities for showing his mettle? There will, of course, be many in his work as choirmaster; but here, with the best intentions in the world, he will not be able to avoid occasional compromise. Many considerations, practical and local, will hamper him in his choice of choir music. The financial resources at his disposal, the kind of vocal material available, type of service, local traditions,—these and many other matters may compel him to retain music below the standard he would desire to set up. This being so, as choirmaster he must go slowly to work, making the best of a bad job, and bowing down in the house of Rimmon as little as may be. In the matter of organ music, however, he has a free hand. The powers-that-be may protest, the man in the pew may make damning comparisons between the music played by the compleat organist and that to be heard from the reedy instrument at the local picture palace, where his sentimental soul may be ravished by the 'Simple Aven,' the 'Cavatina,' and the rest of that threadbare ilk. The organist who does his duty holds on his course. He will not adopt offensive or superior airs. He will merely say in effect, 'As an organist I owe a duty to my art, and have no use for any but good organ music. If I give you the best, and you cannot enjoy it, the loss is yours. It is no part of my business to give you what you want, but what you need. You need the best, but, your musical intelligence being in a state of arrested development, you want the worst. If you will keep your mouth closed and your ears open for a space, you will very soon come to want what you need.' Thus the player who puts art before convenience.

Now, while the artist, so far as his art is concerned, is a cosmopolitan, ever ready to hail the best from whatever source, it is a pardonable weakness—perhaps even a duty—to cast a specially favouring eye on the work of his fellow-countrymen. How does the average English organist stand in this respect? One can form some opinion only from a study of published recital programmes, and such evidence as may be gathered from this source is but a poor compliment to English organ music. Our organists appear to choose their music on much the same lines as public singers. If serious high-class work is desired, a foreign composer is drawn on; for the less worthy items an Englishman suffices.

In order to back up this assertion, I have just taken up at random the programmes of twenty recitals, some given by players of repute. Looking through them, I find the English school represented by Hollins's Variations and Fugue in E, Ireland's 'Capriccio,' Luard-Selby's 'Improvisation,' Lemare's 'Romance,' and a couple of Elgar transcriptions. The rest of the English music is headed by Scotson Clark's 'Chorus of Angels,' and is in few cases of any higher artistic merit than that work: having said which, and having some regard for a whole skin, I do not propose to give the composers' names. I am anxious not to spoil my case by over-statement or anything like a suspicion of unfairness, so, finding that the programmes I have just examined are about a year old, I have taken up a batch of as recent a date as the past month or two. In about the same number of programmes I find the only English music of really serious aim to be Parry's Preludes on 'Melcombe' and 'St. Ann's,' Best's 'March for a Church Festival,' Smart's 'Grand March,' and Elgar's Sonata (first movement). There is plenty of Bach, Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, Widor, Karg-Elert, and Guilmant—which is as it should be. But is there no modern English organ-music other than the light recital variety? There is, in abundance, and it is not played so much as it should be because of the lack of enterprise which too often distinguishes the musician who has left his student-days more than a very few years behind him. It saves a lot of trouble to adopt a 'follow-my-leader' attitude in choice of music. So, seeing that such and such well-known recital players are falling over each other in their haste to play some ear-tickling morsel, compounded after a now familiar recipe dealing with Voix celeste, Voix Seraphique, Voix angelica, Voix humana (usually like no voice that ever was on sea or land, save, perhaps, that of a stifled goat), tremulant, and various libels on orchestral instruments,—works in which the interest and effects are due, nine-tenths to the organ-builder, and the remainder to the composer (a ha'porth of bread to an intolerable deal of sack)—seeing this, he must needs add the morsel to his repertoire.

There is somewhat to be said in defence of the recitalist. Like the professional singer, he depends for his engagements upon his power of attracting the crowd. Then, too, much of his work consists in 'showing off' new instruments. A recitalist may be scholarly and refined, but a builder anxious for the repute of his latest box of cunning devices naturally turns a cold eye on such qualities. Wherefore, while the recitalist might perhaps improve the quality of his programmes without loss of attractiveness, we will not overlook his point of view. But for the church organist, who rarely plays away from his own organ, and who has a regular audience at hand waiting to be educated, there is no excuse. It is sheer lack of enterprise. He sees that Mr. Nemo is playing some attractively-named piece, and forthwith orders a copy. Even so in the ballad world, tens of thousands of amateur singers will buy the veriest drivel, if on the title-page appear the magic words 'Sung by —.' Church organists, however, ought to show an independence and judgment superior to that of the amateur singer. We must take into account, too, the still-lingering prejudice in favour of foreign names. It seems incredible at this stage of our musical history, but it is a fact none the less. Does anyone suppose that the splendid Sonata of Reubke would have had a tenth part of its vogue if it had been the work of plain William Brown or Thomas Smith? To begin with, the composer would have found great difficulty in getting it published. This once achieved, it is pretty safe to say that it would have languished on the shelf. Brown or Smith may, a year or two later, have delivered himself of another Sonata, equally fine. This time, with stacks of unsold copies of number one in the balance against him, he would find no publisher at all. And who shall blame the publisher? The fault is with the organists, who will cheerfully spend hours working up a transcription of a complicated orchestral score (which even on the best equipped of organs is a shadow of its real self, and on others a mere travesty), but grudge a half of the time for learning serious English music. For high-class organ works they draw on the well-worn classics they learned in their pupilage, supplemented by an occasional new foreign work. The battle for English orchestral composers is being fought, with varying fortunes, it is true, but still it goes on. That for English organ composers can hardly be said to have begun. It will never be in full swing until the English organist realises his duty and takes his place in the firing line. Powder and shot? There is plenty of good music by native composers waiting to be used. Let us overhaul some of it.

First, it may be well to point out that I base my opinion as to the neglect of most of the following works on the fact of their rarely appearing in recital programmes. They may be well known and frequently used as voluntaries. Let us hope so. But a straw shows which way the wind blows, and the results (given above) of an analysis of some forty programmes is a very substantial straw, and plainly shows a breeze—nay more, half a gale—not favourable to any but the very lightest of English organ music. Further, as tastes differ, I do not expect that all the pieces will be so attractive to the reader as they are to me. I can only guarantee that the works named will be found musicianly, earnest, free from vulgarity, and suitable for the instrument for which they are composed. This does not mean that no works of lighter kind will be included. But there is light music and light music, and it is just as possible and necessary for music to be light without triviality, as for a humorist to be funny without being vulgar. Let me mention a few light pieces first. H. Sandiford Turner's Scherzo in F minor is an excellent specimen of music, which, while light and attractive to the hearer, is full of interest to the player. It has many musicianly touches. Mr. Turner's name is unknown to me, save in connection with this one work, but I fear no contradiction when I say that any English organ composer might have signed this Scherzo without loss of prestige. In E. H. Lemare's 'Arcadian Idyll,' a suite of three movements, we have the well-known recitalist-composer at his best. The Suite consists of a Serenade, a Musette, and a little piece called 'Solitude,' this last a really beautiful melody which seems to call for the 'cello to do it justice. In the Serenade, the delightful imitative treatment of the theme on page 3 will please groundling and pedant alike, as also will the shifting harmonies in the Musette over the pedal point in lines 2 and 3 on page 6. These little pieces are quite easy to play, and are not too long to be used as one item in a programme, while each is of sufficient importance to be played alone. Other attractive items for recital use are Wolstenholme's Scherzo in B flat and 'Three Sketches,' Stuart Archer's 'Theme and Variations,' and Faulkes's Fantasia in A minor. In fact, it is hopeless to attempt a list, so abundant is the supply of works of this kind, light, and at the same time so good musically that no organist need adopt an apologetic attitude when playing them.

Coming to more serious work, there is again a good supply. Want of space will not permit of more than bare mention in most cases, but as that should be sufficient to start the reader investigating for himself, it will serve.

In these days, when so many composers sitting down to write organ music do so with the orchestra at the back of their mind, we must be grateful to any who can produce music which, while modern, is yet expressed in the idiom suitable to the keyed instrument. Such an one is John E. West, whose Fantasia in F and 'Song of Triumph' deserve to be well-known. Both are planned on a big scale, and need a good player and organ of ample resources to do them justice. The Fantasia opens with a short motto-like theme, delivered with full organ. The triplet from this subject is made use of extensively, and a similar rhythmic figure forms a part of the second subject. There is some admirable contrapuntal work in connection with this, especially on page 6, where the pedal and manual discuss it imitatively. A restatement of the opening matter, now in A flat, leads to a section marked Allegretto Scherzando, with fugal treatment of a new subject in F minor. This gives us four pages of neat work in two- and three-part harmony for manuals alone. The Scherzando theme appears in F major, combined with the second subject, over a dominant pedal, on page 14. The bass remains on the dominant for a couple of pages, and when it moves it does so to good purpose, indulging, after some vigorous leaps, in an animated dialogue with the manuals on a figure derived from the Scherzando, commencing thus:

The Reprise to which this leads is followed by a final statement of the second subject in which the double pedal is used with splendid effect, and a short Coda based on the opening figure.

The 'Song of Triumph' is cast, like the Fantasia, on big lines, filling twenty-one pages. There are other points of similarity. Both works are in F, both have a quicker, lighter section in the tonic minor, while the Andante con moto commencing on page 5 of the 'Song of Triumph' is clearly a near relative of the Andante con moto on page 3 of the Fantasia. But let that pass. What is of more moment is the fact that in the latter work we have all the excellent workmanship and abounding vigour of the first. Attention may be drawn to the texture of page 3, to the fine pedal statement of the second subject which follows, to the treatment of the minor version of the opening theme on page 12, and the resounding final cadence. Apropos this close, the composer leaves the tonic (F) for G flat at the end of page 19, and has no more dealings with it until it is brought on in the last three bars. This is perhaps a risky proceeding. One feels that the tonic has been absent for so long that it has become disestablished, and its belated entry gives one the impression of a casual visitor who has just dropped in rather than a tenant who has just come back. On the other hand the emergence of the tonic from such a remote key may be regarded as possessing dramatic significance in connection with the title—a final struggling triumphant breaking through. There are other works of Mr. West's that call for mention, but want of space compels me to restrict my remarks to these two only. As examples of good, strong, well-written music, admirably laid out and developed, they ought to be widely used. Possibly the composer gives us too generous a measure, but when the quality is so good, it were churlish to complain overmuch of this.

Charles Macpherson's 'Fantasy Prelude' having been recently included in the syllabus of the R.C.O. is by way of being well known. But the organist who has long since done with the violent delights of the examination room may have passed it over. To such an one it may be commended as an excellent specimen of modern English organ music. It may be effectively played on an organ of moderate dimensions, and the interest lies in the music itself rather than in what the organ-builder can do for it. This, however, is not to say that there is no scope for good registration. The composer, with all his feeling for modern harmony, does not forget that after all nothing wears better than good, interesting part-writing, and in this piece not the least enjoyable feature is the treatment of the Con moto theme on pages 3 to 7. The final presentment of this theme, Calmato, on the last page, is delicious. This work was written fourteen years ago, and some more organ music from the same pen is surely overdue.

It is to be hoped that the sub-title 'Study' will not give a wrong impression of Dr. Lloyd's 'Elegy.' A useful study in many ways it certainly is, but that is a side-issue. Its main value lies in its being a piece of singular charm and moderate difficulty. A feature of pages 3 and 4 is the long-sustained note for the right foot, while the left plays a detached bass. This passage may be recommended as a study in leaving the swell-pedal severely alone,—a much neglected branch of organ-playing.

Edouard Silas made his home among us for so long that he may be regarded as an English composer. Mention may therefore be made of one of his organ works that seems to be overlooked, and deserves a much better fate,—his 'Fantasia on St. Ann's Tune.' Now that music based on our old psalm-tunes is so widely played, this piece is worth revival. It is moderately difficult, and the whole of the Allegro section brilliantly effective. Two pieces by John Ireland, published together, show the not very common ability to be simple and original. The 'Sursum Corda' is a devotional little piece, very easy to play, while the 'Alla Marcia' contains in its modest dimensions an astonishing amount of energy and musical interest. Many a grand march we wot of has less of both.

Healey Willan is a composer who has given us organ music of so excellent a quality that much might be expected of him. The little Fantasia on 'Ad cœnam Agni providi,' is perhaps his best-known work. His Preludes and Fugues in B minor and C minor show originality and real power. Perhaps the length of the C minor Fugue is against its chance of popularity, yet considering the lengthy works of slender musical interest that lack neither players or listeners, it should not be so. The Prelude is a fine, craggy piece of work, with some striking harmony. These qualities are present also in his Epilogue in D. This piece, of moderate length and difficulty, ought to be very popular, though it is strong meat, and some of the progressions need acquaintance to be appreciated. The middle section consists of a theme showing the influence of plain-song, an influence apparent in other places, both in turns of melody and suggestions of modal harmony. Here is a good example of the rugged vigour of the piece:

The effect of the bare A after the chords of B flat minor and E flat, is startling. A massive treatment of the second subject brings a bold and original work to an end. Of three short pieces by Frank Bridge (published separately) the second and third—Allegro con Spirito in B flat, and Adagio in E—are especially worthy of note. The Allegro is a capital piece in postlude style, while the Adagio is a gem. A beautiful, yearning theme:

is treated fugally, though with no suspicion of dryness or loss of its emotional appeal. There is a fine climax, and the piece ends in the subdued manner of its beginning. It needs no great technical skill to play, but only a musician can do it justice, and only the musical among its hearers will fully appreciate it. There can be no higher praise than this, but, oddly enough, it will be a doubtful recommendation to many organists.

Three other works by young English composers deserving of mention are a 'Rhapsody' by Harold E. Darke, an Idyll, 'The Sea,' by Herbert Arnold Smith, and a delightful 'Fantasy Prelude' by Ernest Bristow Farrar. Here, with many more pieces of good music frequent mention I must stop, realising the hopelessness of attempting anything like a list. Let me conclude by repeating that the battle for the native organ composer must be fought by the native organ player. Publishers and public have their place on the field, of course, but the man behind the gun, first, last, and all the time, must be the organist.

NOTES ON SOME INTERESTING ORGANS AT MAGDEBURG.

BY ERNEST E. ADCOCK.

It would be exceedingly easy—even on the spur of the moment—to name several German towns in which are to be found organs of great antiquarian and musical interest, and amongst them Magdeburg would most assuredly find a high place. Situated on the river Elbe, to the south-west of Berlin, it occupies a position almost at the centre of the German Empire, and, with its suburbs of Buckau and Neustadt, boasts a population of nearly 240,000. There is a fine Gothic Cathedral, and among its chief churches are those dedicated to St. John, St. James, the Holy Ghost, and to St. Katherine. It is to the organs in these sanctuaries that our remarks will mainly be confined.

It will be as well, perhaps, to explain that Magdeburg was the scene of some of the operations in the Thirty Years' War, and in 1631 it was practically demolished by Count Tilly, the generalissimo of the Catholic army. Readers will therefore easily understand that not much in the way of organs emerged from that time of storm and strife, and will comprehend what is meant when the date 1631 is referred to.

The demolition of the town, the writer thinks, also accounts for the almost entire absence of direct records of the early organs which existed at Magdeburg, for it is highly probable that the documents perished with the churches.

For specifications and historical facts relating to organs given in these notes, reliance is placed upon a series of articles by the late Herr R. Palme (organist at the Church of the Holy Ghost at the time of his death), which appeared in the Zeitschrift für Instrumentenbau a few years ago.

I.—THE CATHEDRAL.

This building dates from 1180-1250, but the earliest organ seems to have been contemporaneous with, and similar to, the famous one built for Halberstadt Cathedral in 1361, which instrument is described by Praetorius in his 'Syntagma' (1618). It was typical of several organs in Germany at that time, and readers who wish for a detailed account of it (i.e., the Halberstadt* organ) should consult 'The Story of the Organ,' by C. F. Abdy-Williams.

That there was an organ in Magdeburg Cathedral in 1377 is certain, for on the occasion of a visit of the Kaiser Karl IV. a Te Deum was sung, 'accompanied by the organ.'

The worn-out organ of 1361 was replaced in 1603-05 by a new one from the workshop of Compenius, an organ-builder living at Halle. This artist took the precaution of preserving the specification of the instrument as he found it, and it is evident that it must have been repaired, augmented, and improved from time to time, for it possessed three manuals and twenty-one stops. Compenius's organ, which was a costly one, had forty-five speaking stops and four accessories, and possessed some remarkable features considering its date. Its case, after the style of the period, was sumptuous, and was decorated with angels blowing golden trumpets, cherubs, &c.

* See also 'Geschichte der Kirchenorgeln in Halberstadt,' by Paul Stöbe. Published by Paul de Wit, Leipsic. Price 75M. Illustrated.

In 1631 the case and pipe-work of this instrument suffered much damage, but both the Cathedral and organ appear to have escaped the total demolition which overtook the other churches. No record of any reparation of the instrument is to be found until 1666, so it was either silent for thirty-five years, or the organist had to make the best of the resources left to him. This 1666 restoration was entrusted to Decker, of Quedlinburg.

No further mention is made of the organ until 1830, but it is pretty safe to surmise that repairs of some sort or other were necessary during the intervening period of over 160 years. At the date mentioned the Gothic revival claimed the Cathedral authorities as its victims, and the imposing Baroque case was swept away to make room for an erection in the 'prickly Gothic' style. This 1830 case cost a good deal of money, and there is a profusion of carving about it, but it cannot be compared with the fine one it displaced, nor with the beautiful examples to be found in the churches of St. John and St. James, which happily escaped the hands of the Gothic revivalists.

A new organ, built by Reubke of Hausneindorf, near Quedlinburg, was placed within the case just mentioned in 1856-61. It possessed four manuals, pedals, and eighty-eight speaking stops, and was one of the most important instruments in Germany.

By the beginning of the 20th century, however, Reubke's organ, which required something like the strength of a horse to play upon, was in urgent need of a thorough and complete rebuilding. The work was appropriately enough entrusted to Herr Ernst Rover, the successor to Reubke at Hausneindorf, and 1906 saw the completion of an up-to-date instrument of 100 speaking stops. The wind is supplied by an electric motor of four horse-power, and the pressures vary from 120 m.m. (about 4½ ins.) to 350 m.m. (about 14 ins.). As is usual in modern German organs, the console is fitted with free combinations quite different from anything used in this country, and which are very well described in a letter which appeared in the August issue of the Musical Times. The action is tubular pneumatic on a system of Rover's own devising, and the compass of the manuals is fifty-six notes, while that of the pedal is thirty notes. The specification is subjoined:

Mention is made in the records in 1535, 1707, and 1807 of a smaller organ which was placed somewhere near the Bishop's throne. The instrument of 1807 was built by Hamann and had fifteen speaking stops on two manuals and pedal. The main organ is of course at the west end of the Cathedral.

2.—ST. JOHN'S CHURCH.

This is the oldest of the parish churches of Magdeburg, and occupies a foremost place in the affections of the writer on account of the beauty of its organ case. The German-speaking portion of Europe (and in this are included both High and Low Germany) is peculiarly rich in organ-cases in the Baroque style, and that in St. John's is one of the very best because there is not such a profusion of angels, cherubs, &c., as are to be found in some examples. Of course it cannot be placed upon the same high level as the charming earlier Renaissance cases to be found in Minden Cathedral, St. Giles's at Lubeck, St. John's at Luneburg, St. Anne's at Augsburg, and St. Peter's at Lubeck, but nevertheless it is a splendid case and well worth going a long way to see.

The earlier churches which stood upon the site were all destroyed by fire, and the present fabric is the fourth to occupy the position. Its predecessor was destroyed in the disaster of 1631.

Praetorius gives an account of the organ in the church thus demolished. It possessed fourteen stops on the Ober manual, six on the Brust, and twelve on the Rück-Positiv. There were no pedals.

In 1690, an organ built by the famous Arp Schnitger,† of Hamburg, was placed in the new church which had arisen from the ashes of the old one, and the organ-case dates from this time.

† These are two series of combination buttons, and the nearest parallel to them in this country the writer can think of are those in the Hereford Cathedral organ.

† Spelt 'Schnitker' in Hopkins & Rimbault, where he is wrongly referred to as an 'Abbé.'

Space forbids giving the entire list of stops, so it must suffice to say that there were seventeen speaking stops on Manual I., seventeen on Manual II., thirteen on Manual III., and thirteen on the Pedal. The instrument was particularly well supplied with Mixtures even for a German organ, for it could boast of no less than thirty-six ranks. Another peculiar feature was that there was a 32-ft. reed on the Pedal organ, but no flue stop of that pitch. Such a thing would be unique in this country, but one occasionally comes across it in German organs.

No accounts exist to show that the organ was repaired until 1829, so that Schnitger must have done his work well for it to stand over 180 years before needing serious reparation. The name of the builder on this occasion is unfortunately not given.

Wilhelm Sauer, of Frankfort-on-Oder, received the commission to construct a new organ of sixty-three stops on four manuals and pedals in 1870, and in 1903 he added eleven stops and brought the action, &c., thoroughly up to date. The following is the specification of the instrument as it now stands:

The annual meeting of the Cathedral Choirs of Chichester, Salisbury, and Winchester took place at Winchester Cathedral on September 25. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Dr. G. B. Arnold's setting in F, and the following anthems were included in the service: 'Cry aloud and shout' (Croft), 'Cast me not away' (S. S. Wesley), 'The Lord hath done great things' (Smart), and 'We have heard with our ears' (Sullivan). In commemoration of the Henry Smart centenary all the voluntaries were chosen from that composer's works.

A musical service was given by the Chichester Cathedral Oratorio Society on October 9. The programme consisted of Handel's 'Dettingen Te Deum,' Elgar's 48th Psalm, for which an orchestral accompaniment had been specially prepared by the composer, and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. Mr. F. J. W. Crowe, organist of the Cathedral, conducted, and Mr. E. Stephenson, of Birmingham Cathedral, was at the organ.

The following programme played by Mr. H. Matthias Turton at the dedication of the new organ of Trinity Presbyterian Church at Leeds, deserves quotation for its excellence of choice and design:

Introduction and Passacaglia	Max Reger
Chant de Printemps
Romance sans paroles	Joseph Bonnet
Etude de Concert
Fugue in E flat	Bach
Cortège and Minuet	Debussy
Fantasia in F minor	Mosart
Idyll, Pastorale
Romance and Légende	Mac Dowell
Etude Symphonique	Enrico Bossi

The Annual Convention of the Canadian Guild of Organists was held on September 10 and 11 at St. James's Cathedral Parish House, Toronto. The proceedings were highly successful. They included lectures and a service in the Church of the Redeemer, at which voluntaries were played by Mr. F. G. Killmaster and Mr. G. Holt. An 'At home' was given by Dr. and Mrs. Albert Ham, at the residence of Dr. Albert Ham, president of the Guild.

A dedication Festival was held at Tewkesbury Abbey from September 28 to October 5. On September 30 choirs from the chief neighbouring churches assisted that of the Abbey in a choral Festival and sang King Hall's Service in E flat, Brahms's 'How lovely is Thy dwelling place,' and Handel's 'Worthy is the Lamb,' under the direction of Mr. Percy Baker, organist and choirmaster of the Abbey. On the same day Mr. Baker gave an organ recital.

The Glasgow Society of Organists met for the first time this season on October 4, when a good muster of members attended a lecture by Mr. T. H. Collinson on 'Choir-training and the vocal method.' The membership of the Society is now 114.

A Harvest Thanksgiving service was held at Portsmouth Parish Church on October 5, under the direction of the organist and choirmaster, Mr. R. H. Turner. The service music included Barnby's 'I will give thanks,' Goss's 'O praise the Lord,' some solo works and, as voluntaries, Otto Diesel's 'Festival Prælude' and Grison's 'Grand Marche Triomphale.'

The fifth annual dinner of the Free Church Musicians' Union was held in the Hotel Great Central, London, on October 11, the president, Mr. George Dodds, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, being in the chair. Selections of music were given by the Finchley Presbyterian Church Choir, conducted by Mr. A. G. Heard Norrish, and by soloists. It was announced that the Annual Conference would be held in London in April next, under the presidency of Sir John McClure.

(From a photograph by Wilhelm Müller, Magdeburg.)

On September 24, at St. John's Church, Buckhurst Hill, a large selection of 'The Messiah' was given by the Church Festival Choir, Prout's edition being used. Under Mr. Otley Marshall's direction an admirable and impressive performance was given. The solos were sung by Miss Stella Farmer, Miss Linda Forrest, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop. Mr. Ernest J. Woods played the Overture and accompaniments.

Mr. C. W. Godson, organist of St. Peter's Church, Cleethorpes, is retiring after twenty-six years of service. His farewell recital, noticed in the column below, took place on October 5.

ORGAN MUSIC.

(Original compositions for the organ (New Series), Nos. 21, 22, and 26.)

Marche triomphale. By Walter G. Alcock.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

When a fine set of Chorale Preludes appeared last year as Sir Hubert Parry's first organ composition, a hope was expressed that it would not be his last. Our leading composers, as a rule, so completely succumb to the glamour of the orchestra, and to the attractions of contriving complexities worthy the attention of the new choralism, that the provision of new organ music is left too much to men of lesser mark. These have their place in the scheme of things, but it should not be as dominant factor in a branch of composition requiring more than most the qualities of dignity and scholarship. Wherefore a new work from such a source as 'the English Bach' may be welcomed as a help to redressing the balance. Both Fantasia and Fugue are laid out on a large scale. The former follows the plan of organ Fantasias from time immemorial,—a contrasting of solid, weighty masses of sound, rapid passage work for the manuals, changing harmonies over a fixed bass, and florid pedal passages. These materials are here used with splendid effect. Specially striking are the fifth page, with the triplet figure in the pedal and the demisemiquaver passages and big chords on the manual, and the fine pedal passage on the seventh page, with the grinding discords of the suspensions above. The Fugue, by way of relief, begins with four pages of beautifully flowing treatment of this subject:

Ex. 1. Allegro. ♩ = 60.

The phrasing of the third bar gives a hint of cross rhythms to come. Considerable episodic use is made of the figures (with which the counter-subject opens), and —always a useful servant, ever since Bach turned it to such wonderful account in his third 'Brandenburg Concerto.' Among the many points of rhythmic interest may be mentioned the combination of $\frac{3}{4}$ and $\frac{3}{8}$ in such passages as :

—this last a particularly striking episode, compounded of the three opening notes of the subject in $\frac{3}{4}$ time, with the little counter-subject figure in the bass. The figure of our third quotation is subsequently used with a different rhythmical effect, entering one quaver later in the bar. It is further developed into a triple shake, and finally, in the last page, into a quadruple one. As to the general texture of the work, there is no need to say anything more than that it is of the quality we expect from such a polyphonist as the composer. It demands careful study, for, as with all music of this type, many of its merits do not lie on the surface. It is somewhat difficult to play, and good phrasing is needed to do justice to its many interesting rhythms. As to length, the Fantasia fills seven pages, and the Fugue twelve. The work is in all respects a notable and weighty addition to English organ music.

Mr. Holloway's Suite consists of four movements—Prelude-Chorale, Courante en forme de Canon, Duo and Finale alla Fuga. The Prelude-Chorale is a broad, hymn-like theme delivered first by left hand and pedals, and later in big chords with moving pedal. The Courante is a tuneful movement, the Canon being very fluently and naturally managed. The Duo derives an antique flavour from the staccato bass, and gives opportunities for effective 'thumbing' of the lower of the duet parts on the Great. The Finale is a straightforward Allegro molto, which does not concern itself overmuch with fugal treatment of its theme. A Coda, consisting of the opening chorale, with the subject of the Finale as bass, concludes an effective work of no great degree of difficulty.

The 'Intermezzo' of J. Stuart Archer is to the work just mentioned as the savoury is to the joint. The complete meal has room for both, and we only require that such dietetic luxuries shall be good as well as light. This may be said of the 'Intermezzo,' an uncommonly attractive recital piece, and quite easy to play.

There is nothing in Dr. Alcock's march, which was specially written for the wedding of the Duke of Connaught and the Duchess of Fife, to suggest the pièce d'occasion. It does not attempt the compromise, usually unsatisfactory to both sides, between the popular taste and the taste of musicians, but appeals solely to the latter. The chief tune is a good one, but it is not over-stated. The main interest of the piece lies in its texture, of which the characteristic is arresting harmonies contrapuntally obtained. The march conveys a sense of jubilation tempered with dignity.

First Album of Songs. By Henry G. Ley.

[Sydney Acott & Co., Oxford.]

The organist of Christ Church enters somewhat timidly upon the thorny path of composition; he has to lean at times upon the staff of convention, and once here, in casting it aside, he plunges into inappropriateness. His setting of Shelley's well-known lines 'As the moon's soft splendour' is too much underlined. It is good music, but made to a preconceived form—a quiet section, modulation and turbulence, a climax, a pause, the first section again, with a high note—that does not grow out of the words. In 'Music when soft voices die,' the first song in the Album, and in the 'Cradle song,' which comes third, the support of convention is much in evidence. For the three remaining songs we have nothing but praise—except for an allusion we must make to the composer's over-fondness for the 'suspension' and 'accented grace-note' type of harmony. 'Christ in a garden buried lay' has an old-world feeling, with well and consistently worked ideas. 'A Litany' ('Drop, drop, slow tears,' by Phineas Fletcher) is 'atmospheric,' and suggestive by the simplest possible means. The success with which Mr. Ley conceives and carries this through would suggest a natural bent for this manner of music. He gets far away from the drawing-room sentiment of his first song. The final number, 'The call,' is built on fine, uprising strains and adds buoyancy to buoyant words. It requires a quick-eyed accompanist. In this volume there is enough of originality and creative musicianship to earn warm encouragement. Some shackles have yet to be cast off, and some deeper insight into the poetic adaptation of music to words yet to be gained. But the gift for song writing is apparent.

'As the hart panteth.' By B. Marcello. Chorister series of Church Music.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Marcello's setting for two treble voices of verses 1 and 15 of Psalm xlii. has been added to the useful 'Chorister series of Church music,'—a series designed for use in 'quires and places' where services are at times sung by boys only. Marcello's pleasant strains are admirably adapted for boys' voices. The music is of the same degree of difficulty as Handel's 'O Lovely Peace' and 'Hail! smiling Liberty,'—with which type of work it has much in common. The anthem formed a very acceptable test for boys' choirs at the recent Blackpool competitive Festival.

Twenty Preludes and Postludes. (Choral studies.) By Sigfrid Karg-Elert. Op. 78.

[Carl Simon : Berlin.]

Herr Karg-Elert is at his happiest in dealing with the hymn-tunes of his country. Organists who appreciate his 'Sixty-five choral improvisations' will find this collection every whit as enjoyable. The pieces are mainly small in size, and will serve admirably for voluntaries. Being for the most part only moderately difficult, they will also provide enjoyable work for students. It is not easy to resist the temptation to quote, and almost as difficult to select any numbers for special praise when all are so good. But we may venture to draw attention to the vigorous treatment of 'Allein Gott in der Höh' (No. 1), to the exquisite harmonization of 'Machs mit mir, Gott' (No. 13), and to the naive simplicity of the little piece on 'Liebster Jesu'—simplicity of the kind that only a gifted composer is capable of. The set concludes with a version of 'Vom Himmel Hoch' for organ, voice, and violin.

Study in E♭ minor. By Chopin. Study in C♯ minor. By Chopin. Transcribed and paraphrased for the organ by Edwin H. Lemare.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

At first sight Chopin would appear to be a composer whose works would ill bear transference to the organ. As a matter of fact, however, some of his pianoforte works as consisting mainly of a melody and accompaniment can be quite effectively transcribed. A certain loss in expressive power is compensated for by the gain in sostenuto, while, thanks to the Pedal organ, one is able to obtain a clearness in passages of changing harmony over a fixed bass impossible on the pianoforte. These two studies have been adapted by Mr. Lemare in such a manner that they can be effectively played on small organs. They require only an expressive solo stop, and a suitable accompaniment. They are only moderately difficult in their new guise, and should be welcome additions to the organist's repertory.

Diana and two Symphonies. A Novel. By Geoffrey Toye.
[William Heinemann.]

When the average writer of fiction plunges into music he usually flounders and raises the smile of pity. Mr. Toye, being not only a musical critic but a clever writer and a musician, keeps us genuinely amused and interested. Half of his book is nimble satire on English musical life, with personalities ostensibly avoided. Here and there the cap seems to fit, although not perhaps by the author's design. The story of Diana and her love troubles, with which a musical journal is less concerned, will appeal to those who enjoy what is best in modern fiction.

Days with the Great Composers. Vol. iii. Mozart, Schumann, Tchaikovsky.

[Hodder & Stoughton.]

This little work sets out with the intention of giving a description of a representative day in the life of a great composer. Such an undertaking is necessarily to a large extent imaginary, though enough that is authentic in the way of incident and quotation is added to make the book of some value to the more youthful readers. Perhaps it would have been better had a simpler style been adopted. The child of to-day is a sophisticated being, who has as little liking for the 'high-falutin'' as his elder, perhaps even less. He could spare such passages as 'a dull fire smouldering in his languid, absent-minded eyes.' We know that 'dull fire,' a favourite ingredient of the novelette writer. In the section devoted to Mozart, much is of course made of the tragic commission of 'The Requiem,' undertaken at the request of a 'tall lean stranger, clad in ghostly grey,' who 'suddenly appeared before him,' when the composer was at work on 'Die Zauberflöte,' which immortal work Mozart was composing at his pianoforte, if we are to believe the accompanying illustration—one of many in colours, mostly excellent, with which the book is plentifully supplied.

Two hundred ear-tests. For A.R.C.O. candidates. By Katharine S. Jones, F.R.C.O.

[Vincent Music Co.]

These tests have been written in conformity with the regulations, and should be useful to candidates in preparing for this now important part of the examination.

Correspondence.

CHARLES YOUNG AND FAMILY.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Quite recently I came across another error respecting the 'Young' family. On page 40 of the 'Origin and progress of the meeting of the three choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, commenced by the Rev. Daniel Lysons and continued down to the present time by John Amott, organist of Gloucester Cathedral' (1864), the following statements are made: 'At the Gloucester meeting in 1763: a second female singer was engaged this year, the Hon. Mrs. Scott, formerly Isabella Young, daughter of the organist of Catherine Cree Church, a mezzo-soprano voice.' This is supplemented by a printed note, supplied by Dr. E. Rimbault, which is brimful of error: 'Anthony Young, organist of St. Clement Danes, and afterwards of All Hallows', Barking, and St. Catherine Cree, had three daughters—Cecilia, afterwards Mrs. Arne; Esther, afterwards Mrs. Jones; and Isabella, afterwards Mrs. Lampe. After the death of Lampe, the composer, in 1751, his widow married the Hon. Mr. Scott.'

My article in September last (page 586) shows that Mrs. Lampe remained a widow until her death in 1795. The Hon. Mrs. Scott was her niece, a daughter of Charles Young, and was born in 1739. Christened Isabella, she married, in 1757, the Hon. John Scott, son of the third Earl of Delamore, and died in 1791. Her husband predeceased her in 1788. They had one son, John Scott, a midshipman, who was killed in action on board the 'Tartar' frigate, 1777, aged nineteen.

The Hon. Mrs. Scott appeared again at the Worcester Festival in 1764.—Yours truly, W. H. CUMMINGS.

BRITISH v. FOREIGN PIANOS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Now that the British Music Exhibition is well over, we can look back and calculate the net results.

In the first place this great Show at Olympia was undoubtedly the direct outcome of the notice taken by the Press last year of the wholesale introduction of foreign pianofortes into the Guildhall School of Music. As a result of that agitation, the British Manufacturers' Association arranged a Music Exhibition on such a scale as has never been promoted before, either in this or any other country.

The result has been that many thousands of music-lovers have attended and endorsed what was stated last year, and what was so admirably expressed by the Lord Mayor himself, when he said at Olympia that 'British manufacturers of musical instruments had laboured successfully to prove that, for splendid workmanship, artistic merit, and brilliancy of tone, their instruments could not be excelled by any of the world's manufacture.' After such words as these falling from our Lord Mayor in the presence of his Sheriffs and members of the Court, I take it that there will be no question of renewing this autumn contracts with foreign houses when those that caused such a scandal last year expire.—Yours faithfully,

HY. BILLINGHURST,
Managing Director, JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, LTD.

CONVEYANCE OF VIOLONCELLOS BY RAIL.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—All violoncello players who read my letter which appeared in the July number may by this time be wondering if any advance has been made to move the railway companies to alleviate the unfair charge now made on those who take their instruments with them as hand luggage. I have recently called on the Secretary of the Orchestral Association at their headquarters in Archer Street, Soho, London, W., and have sent him a copy of a petition to the Railway Clearing House with a few signatures of violoncellists I have been able to obtain. Signatures of all musicians, whether cellists or not, will be welcomed, and it is hoped that a sufficiently large number may be received, so that the case may be ready for consideration at the next quarterly meeting of Railway Managers, to be held in January.

Yours faithfully,

Clarence House,
Connaught Road, Reading. FREDERICK FELLOWES.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Apropos Mr. Harvey Grace's article on 'Voluntaries' in your September issue, may I supplement his list of short pieces by Rheinberger and others, by pointing out that the preludes to Bach's cantatas make admirable—and devotional—opening voluntaries. They are quite short, and only take from two to four minutes in performance. Two of these I have in mind as I write: The introduction to 'My spirit was in heaviness' and that to 'God's time is the best.' The latter piece, by-the-by, is called a 'Sonatina' not 'Introduction.' I heard it played by Dr. Walford Davies some time ago, and the impression it left on my mind will never fade. In spite of its brevity, it is most beautiful.—Yours truly,

W. J. C. HEWISON.

P. S.—With reference to the prelude to 'God's time is the best,' the following incident may amuse your readers. I played the piece in question before service, some few weeks ago. Afterwards, I was addressed as follows by a member of the congregation:—'That was a charming thing you played this morning. So different from that stodgy music by Bach you so often give us.'

VOCAL EXERCISES BY PORPORA.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—In his book, 'Philosophy of Voice,' by C. Lunn, beginners are recommended to use a sheet of exercises which are said to be the identical ones given by the old Italian school of Porpora.

I shall be pleased if any of your readers could tell me if these exercises are still obtainable. I have tried the publishers of the work, but they cannot recommend me where to look for it.—Yours truly,

B. HUDSON.

Obituary.

We regret to have to record the death of:

LOUIS FERDINAND H. RIES, violinist, in London, on October 3. The deceased came of a musical family. His father, Hubert (1802-86) was a son of Franz Ries (1755-1846), and his uncle, Ferdinand (1784-1838) was a pupil of Beethoven. Louis was born at Berlin on January 30, 1830. He received his first lessons from his father at Berlin, and when he was twenty-two years of age he went to Paris and studied under Vieuxtemps, with whom he came to London. Here he became a member of the Musical Union Quartet formed under Mr. Ella. In 1858 he joined the famous Monday Popular Quartet in which Joachim, Norman Neruda (Lady Hallé), Piatti, and other eminent string players were concerned. He retired in 1897, when he had reached the age of sixty-seven. He was fortunate in that he carried into private life good health, while his mastery of his instrument was still at its height. After a few years at Hampstead he took a beautiful country house in Hertfordshire, where he resided till five years ago. There he led the life of a country gentleman, and surprised his friends by his firm, elastic tread as he would saunter forth in the morning with his gun and his little terrier—a constant companion—to try his luck with the rabbits. After luncheon he would gather his sons and one or two friends together for a quartet or a quintet, for he retained to the last his love of his art and his keen interest in everything musical. To join Ries in a String quartet by Beethoven, Haydn, or Brahms was to conjure up visions of bygone days when Joachim, Ludwig Straus, and Piatti were his colleagues. Many a time the tears would come into the old man's eyes as he played one of the beautiful movements of the great masters. After playing three big works, with only a brief interval for tea, he would be ready to enjoy a game of billiards. He was a true, trusted friend to any who won his regard, and he never failed to give a helping hand to a colleague, or kindly encouragement to all who played with him. Those who knew him best came to love him most, for his mind never harboured a thought that was not pure and worthy.

(By permission, from a Photograph by Francis, Byrne & Co., Ltd., Richmond, Surrey.)

So loyal a spirit is all too rare, and those most with him in his last years will not readily fill the gap which remains now Louis Ries has gone to his well-earned rest. All will unite in sympathy with his devoted companion through fifty years. The many friends of Mrs. Ries will hope that for years to come they may still be privileged to enjoy her ready kindness.

LEEDS TRIENNIAL FESTIVAL.

If it were attempted to decide which is our leading permanent musical Festival, the discussion would probably be narrowed to the claims of Birmingham, Leeds, and Sheffield. The three stand out similarly in bulk and character of programme, in scale of presentation, and in their endeavour to discard the heavy cloak of tradition. All have served as rallying-points of controversy as to the utility of Festivals. It has been cogently argued that a Festival has the effect of storing up for itself and then quickly exhausting the musical appetite of the neighbourhood, that musical life would thrive better on meals taken in smaller quantity and greater frequency. Be that as it may, there is much to plead in defence of Festivals, and tangible results can be opposed to hypothesis. The dislocation, if any, is local: the benefit is national. New works of importance need an introduction that commands attention from the whole body of musicians in the country. With orchestral music this can be achieved at the leading concerts of London and Manchester, but a modern choral work, such as Mr. Hamilton Hart's 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' requires for its launching such a combination of choir, soloists, and orchestra—all of the front rank—as is only attainable under Festival conditions. The ordinary work of many Choral Societies, especially in the north, is habitually on the level with, or perhaps superior to, the Festival choral standard, but it does not provide for such all-round excellence as that which made the performance of Verdi's 'Requiem' at Leeds memorable. Festivals serve a national purpose in bringing responsible experts from the chief centres in the country to focus their attention upon what is new, and to reconsider what is old. New standards, summarized at these gatherings, are helped to spread their influence over the country. Would that opera, in England, had the same chances that are granted to other forms of music!

Whatever may be said of Festivals in general, no one could deny that the Leeds Festival of 1913 was worth while. New music, a new personnel, and a new spirit combined to make it eventful and important. There were for the first time three conductors, Sir Edward Elgar, Dr. H. P. Allen, and Herr Arthur Nikisch, a change which enlivened the interest and made for the best by the division of labour. No one conductor could have given us Strauss's 'Ein Heldenleben' and Bach's 'Jesu, priceless Treasure,' as these were given under Herr Nikisch and Dr. Allen respectively. There was, moreover, special interest in the personality of the soloists; and the Festival provided many artistic triumphs, both for the individual and for the mass.

There was likewise food for amusement. On the Thursday evening, after some three hours of music, it was announced from the platform that owing to the lateness of the hour Mozart's G minor Symphony would not be performed. On the next evening the committee, wise between the events, excised Berlioz's 'Benvenuto Cellini' Overture from the beginning of the programme. Such evidence of human fallibility among the selectors earned pardon for the inclusion of such music as Boito's Prologue to 'Mefistofele.' To the Londoner who chanced to arrive late at a concert there was humour in the spectacle of a dozen or so of Leeds policemen minutely directing the progress of one motor car through empty streets to the Town Hall.

The programme was designed to meet many tastes—the traditional, the conventional, the intellectual, the sensuous, the studious, the curious, the voracious, the eclectic, the national, the Continental, the Wagnerian, the Oxonian, the satirical, and—with Bach's choral music—the fundamental. The most interesting of modern schools (the French) was passed over; and people for whom musical history begins with Scriabine were not invited.

The choir, thanks to the admirable work of Mr. Fricker, the choirmaster, attained the lofty standard essential to the Leeds Festival. Its training was admirable, it had unity in part and in whole, its tone was of gorgeous colour and fine gradation, and these qualities were made good with an ease that opened the path to expressiveness. It was not conspicuously the best Festival choir we have heard, nor could we name one that was superior. What chiefly stamped the choral singing with excellence was the enlightened use to which the properties of the choir were put. The technique, exceptional as it was, was made subordinate. There was no trickery, manufactured brilliance, over-sentimentalising, exaggeration, or over-restraint.

The powers of the choral body were put to their first test at the morning concert of October 1, when, under Sir Edward Elgar, the following programme was given:

Overture, 'Leonore' No. 3		Beethoven
'The dream of Gerontius'		Elgar
'Ode to Music'		Parry
'Rhapsody' for contralto solo and male-voice choir		Brahms
Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90		Brahms

With the composer of 'The dream of Gerontius' before them, and demanding from them all that his sensitive and deep-seated nature expressed in the music, the chorists could give nothing less than their best and sincerest work. The performance was worthy of the occasion in its vitality and expressive range. Little more need be said, as the important novelties of the Festival demand space for consideration. Of the soloists, it is sufficient to mention that they were Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Robert Radford. The same artists were joined by Miss Carrie Tubb in Sir Hubert Parry's 'Ode to music,' produced at the Leeds Festival of 1895. On that occasion it was written in these columns that the work was one of 'considerable beauty and charm,' and that it was 'thoughtful, manly, deeply expressive, and moving.' Eighteen years of rapid progress have not affected the truth of this judgment. The Overture and the Symphony proved the mettle of the London Symphony Orchestra, and the performance of the 'Rhapsody' was worthy of its classic beauty.

In the evening, Herr Nikisch was conductor-in-chief, and the programme was as follows:

Overture, 'Oberon'		Weber
Scena from 'Oberon'		Weber
Miss EDITH WALKER.
Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor		Tchaikovsky
Madame CARREÑO.
Choral scherzo, 'Song on May morning'		Basil Harwood
(First performance.)
Symphony No. 5, in E minor		Tchaikovsky

Apart from the new choral work both the music of this programme and the manner of its presentation were familiar to those who live in the world of music. Herr Nikisch made his Leeds début in music admirably chosen for the purpose. He and his fellow artists lived up to repute.

'SONG ON MAY MORNING.'

Dr. Harwood has found an individual treatment of Milton's lines: 'Now the bright morning star, day's harbinger, comes dancing from the east, . . .'. It is nearly all dance music, elegant, refined, and melodically ornate. The words are set contemplatively, with many repetitions, rather than descriptively. The opening and final choral sections are separated by two orchestral dances. The 'Dance of the morning star' has a delicate, stately measure that suggests classical draperies and much poising; the 'Dance of the May' which follows, is built on pretty musical ideas, elaborately decorated, and conveys a sense of quicker bodily movement. The choir then re-enters, accompanied, as in the opening of the work, by the music of the 'Dance of the Morning Star.' The words 'Thus we salute thee with our early song, and welcome thee and wish thee long' are fugally treated, with a well-built jubilant climax. It need hardly be said that the choral writing is polished and delicately effective, and that the fanciful detail of the orchestral music, though elaborate, is of high musical quality. There is no deceiving of the ear with masses of sound. From beginning to end the music is pellucidly clear. The characteristic qualities of the work are its originality of treatment and its reticence.

At the morning concert of October 2 the following works were given under Herr Nikisch:

'Manzoni Requiem'		Verdi
Rhapsody, 'A Shropshire lad'		Butterworth
Motet, 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure'		Bach
Symphony No. 7, in A		Beethoven

The performance of Verdi's now popular 'Requiem' has already been referred to as of outstanding excellence. Herr Nikisch interpreted all its warmth and dignity, and secured orchestral accompaniment of surpassing beauty and brilliance. The choral singing was of unflagging vitality and charm. It was a pleasure to hear two such singers in the soprano and contralto solo parts as Madame Noordewier-Reddingius and Madame P. de Haan-Manifarges. Both are gifted with beautiful voices and mastery of style, and they achieved the perfection of unity in their duets. The unaccompanied passage for the two voices in octaves at the opening of the 'Angus Dei' was quite remarkably sung. It was interesting to observe the striking personality of Herr Van Rooy's art, so long identified amongst us with Wotan, Karwenal, and so forth, occupied for once in the by-path of Italian devotion. Needless to say, his singing was tremendously sincere and sonorous. The tenor music was admirably sung by Mr. John Coates.

'A Shropshire lad,' based on a song entitled 'The cherry tree,' from Mr. Butterworth's setting of A. E. Housman's cycle, 'A Shropshire lad' represents the meditations of an exile. It is short and simple, but what little it sets out to convey it expresses with depth and refined feeling. The composer handles the orchestra with a quiet strength and perfect fitness and consistency. The work is not rich in invention, but it forms a distinct picture, and the audience's warm approval was well earned.

In 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure' Dr. Allen made his début. It is not long since his performance of the same motet with the Bach Choir in London earned special commendation from all who were judges of Bach choral singing. His experience and knowledge not only of this work but of

Bach's music in general were expended on splendid material at Leeds, and the performance was one of well-nigh perfect beauty. There was the combination of vitality, restraint, and the art of the phrase that are the necessary basis for the interpretation of such music.

The programme on the Thursday evening was as below. Sir Edward Elgar conducted:

Symphonic-poem, 'Dante and Beatrice'	Bantock
Prologue to 'Meistofele'	Boito
Song, 'O don fatale'	Verdi
Miss MURIEL FOSTER.
'Falstaff' (first performance)	Elgar
'The Mystic Trumpeter' (first performance)	Hamilton Harty
'The Storm Wind' (unaccompanied)	Cornelius
Love, I give myself to thee (part-songs)	Mozart (Symphony in G minor

Sir Edward Elgar was hard-worked on this evening. He conducted 'Dante and Beatrice' with full knowledge of its scope and meaning, made some effect with the unnecessary Boito excerpt, and guided the accompaniment to Miss Foster's splendid singing—all as a preliminary to conducting the first performance of one of his most difficult and complex works.

ELGAR'S 'FALSTAFF.'

It will readily be understood that the production of Sir Edward Elgar's new Symphonic-Study for full orchestra, 'Falstaff,' aroused keen expectation and attention. The work was to show Elgar in a new vein, and this has always meant a masterpiece. 'Falstaff' proved no different. As a piece of psychological description it is of striking truth and force, and the material of which it is made shows the working of a lively and powerful invention. The purpose, programme, and themes of the work were described by the composer himself in our issue for September. The frequently made suggestion that 'Falstaff' has kinship with Strauss's 'Don Quixote' has only outward justification. In each case the music follows an un-heroic hero through his vicissitudes and puts him to rest with pathos on the violoncello. Beyond this the comparison breaks down. Elgar, with a phraseology that springs from the past and finds ever-fresh sources in the known ways of harmony and melody, achieves as telling a description of a man's mind and surroundings as Strauss with his new ways. His picture of Falstaff worthily represents the man who lives and dies in the historical plays. The two chief themes of the hero are very aptly evolved, although the mistake has been made of judging them as tunes and finding them unengaging. They show a farcical, unlovely, boaster, with the remnants of good feeling in him. Harry's themes, too, are significant, and they make fine, soaring music. The Gadshill scene is thoroughly enjoyable. It 'acts' as well on the concert platform as on the stage. Thematic metamorphosis plays its part here. Harry's melody is broken up into jerks of suppressed, excited laughter, and Falstaff's boastful crochets are scattered to the winds in coward quavers. The composer dwells lovingly on the conviviality that follows the return of the robbers, and the Hostess and Doll Tearsheet are much in evidence. At the first hearing it was not clear where the need lay for so much re-statement here. Perhaps its motive will reveal itself later. Soon, as the mists gather in Falstaff's brain, and he sinks into sonorous slumber, the composer's inspiration is at its highest. The transition from semi-conscious drunkenness to the sweet dream of a far-off youth is one of the cleverest passages in a clever work; and the dream itself is a delicious little episode recalling not, as has been said, the Elgar of the Symphonies, but the Elgar of 'The wand of youth.'

When the king's summons to war (a fine musical effect) breaks up the revelry, the composer pours out all his 'Cockaigne' and 'Pomp and Circumstance' humour—more cunningly devised now—upon Falstaff's martial occupation. Here the second episode—Falstaff leading the simple life at Justice Shallow's—again shows a picture of gentleness and peace across the turbulent scene. After this the music goes from strength to strength. Henry the King, not forgetful (the orchestra tells us) of Harry the scapegrace, comes through London with new splendour and a new theme. Falstaff's view of the situation is declared by an enriching of Harry's old theme. The music shows the challenge and repudiation with the utmost vividness, and Falstaff's first blaze of anger flashes with terrific effect across the score. Twice more, as the old knight, for whom Elgar makes one truly sorry, pleads and almost whimpers, the orchestra gives him curt dismissal. The pathos of the end is remarkable. We all know in what manner Falstaff died. When he 'babbles of green fields' the composer sends a vision of Gloucestershire and Shallow's orchard through his mind. His last breath catches on the memory of King Henry's cruelty. Listening to this music, with the words of the Hostess in mind, one's imagination is deeply stirred.

In 'Falstaff' Elgar's individual style reaches its furthest development. The themes have life, and the listener is kept continually on the qui vive by their quick, subtle treatment, by the amazing vitality and fluency of the harmonies, and by the still more amazing orchestration. It may be safely said that the work is unsurpassed in modern music for variety, effectiveness, and sureness of orchestral writing. In recording one's impressions of a first hearing of the work it is easier to declare admiration of its deeper and wider qualities than to give a comparative estimate of them. It is enough to say that the music is sheer Elgar.

'THE MYSTIC TRUMPETER.'

Mr. Hamilton Harty is not the first British musician to make a setting of Walt Whitman's 'The Mystic Trumpeter.' The suggestion of music runs throughout the poem in contrasted phases, and the poet's diction is clear and dignified. With these, and other qualities, the poem naturally yields a strong attraction for the modern composer. It demands pictorial treatment, and here Mr. Harty has succeeded well. His music to each section is strongly typical. The opening, where the muted trumpet 'vibrates capricious tunes,' is a clever piece of tone-painting. The first stanza, set for baritone solo, and the second, set for chorus, are allied to thoughtful music. At the third stanza, a warmer colour enters, and conveys the ecstasy of a freed spirit 'floating and basking upon Heaven's lake.' Next follow the most effective sections of the work—that in which a mediæval pageant passes before the speaker, to an exhilarating dance rhythm and spirited passages growing out of it, and that in which the baritone solo voice sings of love, 'the enclosing theme of all, the solvent and the setting.' The composer does not wax sentimental over this. His music glows less with passion than with poetry, of the type of the 'Preislied.' It is a fine, rich page of music. The ecstatic mood yields to one of despair as, to the measure of a funeral march, all the world's wickedness and sorrow pass across the screen. Here we are given some powerfully effective music. The final section, a prophetic vision of the 'rank earth purged—nothing but joy left,' is set to straightforward, buoyant music, that makes a good 'curtain.' The whole work is effective, and holds the attention. There is no groping for the imagined hidden treasures of music. The composer pursues his path in the open, and appeals to chorals, choral-trainers, and audiences who have a taste for open-air music. Mr. Harty's experience enables him to write with knowledge and fluency for both choir and orchestra.

The performance was carried along to great popular success by the enthusiasm of the choir and the whole-hearted and expressive singing of Mr. Thorpe Bates. The composer, who conducted, was heartily acclaimed.

The two works of Cornelius, more fit for the isolated attention of a smaller and less busy choir, were more than creditably performed under Mr. Fricker's direction. It was then a quarter to eleven o'clock, and the Symphony was abandoned. There was probably not much waste of rehearsal time.

The Friday morning programme consisted of Bach's Mass in B minor. It placed the highest test upon the choir's powers of singing and Dr. Allen's powers of conducting, and found them fit to cope with its tremendous exactions. The execution of the music was of a quality that is seldom excelled, and the style of expression adopted steered between dullness and theatricality. It was always interesting, and usually of considerable beauty and majesty. Madame Noordenwier-Reddingius and Madame de Haan-Manifarges again showed a great sense of style, and Messrs. Elwes and Radford were excellent as usual. M. Mischä Elman played the violin obligato. It is to be regretted that lack of space forbids adequate consideration of this notable concert, and admits of only brief reference to those that followed.

On the Friday evening the programme, after the initial curtainment already referred to, was as follows:

Irish Rhapsody	Stanford
Violin Concerto	Beethoven
Soloist, MISCHA ELMAN.
Choral ballad, 'Täufeler,' Op. 52	Richard Strauss
Tone-poem, 'Ein Heldenleben,' Op. 40	Richard Strauss
Excerpts from 'Götterdämmerung'	Wagner

The first number provided a worthy tribute to the late conductor of the Festival. Elman's admirable interpretation of the Beethoven Concerto is, happily, no novelty. Strauss's Ballad gave choir, orchestra, and two soloists—Messrs. John Coates and Thorpe Bates—some minutes of strenuous life; it is fluent, valiant music, but it comes from the brain and not from the heart. Its effect was entirely eclipsed by that of 'Ein Heldenleben,' into which Herr Nikisch threw his whole strength and brilliance. The orchestra, well versed in the work by their frequent performances under Mengelberg and others, played with splendid enthusiasm and grip. The selection from Götterdämmerung consisted of the duet of Brunnhilde and Siegfried in the first Act (with Miss Edyth Walker and Mr. John Coates as soloists), the 'Trauermarsch,' and the Closing Scene, unfortunately and unwisely shorn of its climax.

Saturday morning's music was entirely by Wagner. It consisted of the 'Faust' Overture; the Prelude and Closing Scene from Act I of 'Parsifal,' with Herr Van Rooy as Amfortas and Mr. Robert Radford as Titurel; and the Prelude and selections from Act 3 of 'Die Meistersinger,' with Mr. John Coates as Walther and Herr Van Rooy as Sachs. It was all excellently done. At the final concert of the Festival 'Elijah' was given under Dr. Allen with Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Robert Radford as principal soloists.

THE BACH FESTIVAL AT EISENACH.

By H. DAVEY.

Besides the biennial movable Festivals given by the Neue Bachgesellschaft, smaller Festivals are now given, in the intervening years, at Eisenach. The second of these took place on September 27 and 28.

Eisenach was Bach's birthplace, but shows little pride in the fact. The town is dominated by Luther, who sang through the streets as a choirboy, just as Bach did two centuries after. In 1521 Luther was hidden in the Wartburg. Some three centuries earlier still than Luther, in 1207 to be exact, the same famous castle witnessed the Tournament of Song between Tannhäuser, Wolfram, Biterolf, and the other Minnesingers. And the great green panorama of wooded hills seen on every side is broken on the east by one little white peak, marking the barren rock of the Hörselburg, cursed as the retreat of the demon Venus, who allured Tannhäuser. All these matters are part of popular German knowledge; but Luther eclipses the other figures.

The house in which Bach was born is now a museum. Eisenach has little active musical life. At the previous Festival a choir was brought from Salzungen, besides the Madrigalchor (picked double-quartet) from Berlin; on this occasion Duisburg, justly proud of its success in 1910, sent its a cappella Choral Society, under Josephson. The soloists mostly came from Berlin; but Amsterdam sent Dr. Vogel, for the viola d'amore; Dobereiner from Munich and Albini from Rome played the viol-da-gamba; Leipsic, Weimar, and the distant Kattowitz contributed violin soloists. Local talent was represented only by Musikdirektor Camillo Schumann, who opened the Festival with the big organ Fugue in E minor (called the 'Night Watchman' fugue in Germany, the 'Scissors' or 'Wedge' in England).

A large proportion of the items were not by Bach, but by older composers, reprinted in the 'Denkmäler der deutschen Tonkunst.' The sacred concert (in the Georgenkirche) included a singular Biblical Scene by Schütz, 'The Boy Jesus in the Temple.' After the dialogue (Luke ii. vv. 48-9) the Holy Family, with the choir, join in an exquisite setting of 'How lovely is Thy dwelling-place.' The Duisburg Choir sang two most impressive motets, 'Der Gerechte, ob er gleich stirbt,' by J. Christoph Bach (organist of the Georgenkirche, 1665-1703, and probably the composer of 'I wrestle and pray'), and a weirdly thrilling 'Mirabile mysterium,' by Gallus (Handl, of Carniola). At the secular concerts, held in the Fürstenhof, the Madrigalchor from Berlin sang several delightful madrigals by Schein and Hassler; one was very suggestive of our own Morley, whose works had been several times reprinted in Germany, and were doubtless known to Schein. The word 'Rundadinella' occurred repeatedly, as a kind of jubilation or 'Fa la la.' Some songs and dialogues by H. Albert, who holds a place in German music analogous to Henry Lawes in ours; and instrumental works by Buxtehude, Corelli, Dall' Abaco (at Munich in Bach's time), and C. Stamitz, were heard with the greatest interest. Kuhnau's 'David and Goliath' Sonata, played on the harpsichord by Madame Landowska, sounds, I think, better on the pianoforte until the 'Flight of the Philistines,' which has a much lighter and highly realistic effect on the harpsichord. Two familiar airs from 'Jephtha,' though sung with tasteless cadenzas, reminded us that Handel knew some things which Bach himself did not.

The Church Cantatas No. 57 (dialogue) and No. 54 (alto solo), a part of a complimentary serenade, 'Durchlaucht'ser Leopold,' and two sacred part-songs were the vocal numbers from Bach's own works. Fräulein Lessmann, Frau Werner-Jensen, and Herr Weissenborn were the soloists. It was delightful to hear the sixth 'Brandenburg Concerto' performed as a real sextet without doubled parts, Dr. Seiffert filling in the figured bass. The difficult Violin fugue in C major (wonderfully given by Herr Klingler), the second Duet-sonata with flute, No. 3 of the Duet-sonatas with violin, and the Violin concerto in A minor, were also included. The conclusion was a double performance of Vivaldi's Concerto for four violins, played as originally written, then in Bach's arrangement for four clavier. Dr. Kretschmar, who conducted, had a well-deserved ovation at the end.

Last year one of Bach's lost cantatas, 'Mein Herze schwimmt in Blut,' was discovered at Copenhagen. It has just been published by the Neue Bachgesellschaft, both in score according to the autograph and with pianoforte arrangement for practical use. It is written for soprano solo, with accompaniment of strings, oboe, bassoon, and continuo; and was composed in Bach's Weimar time, about 1715. The discoverer, C. A. Martienssen, has edited the publication.

THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The annual conference of this Society opens at the Hotel Cecil, London, on December 29.

The following are the chief features of the programme: December 29.—Reception.

December 30.—Special service at St. Stephen's, Walbrook. Opening meeting at the Mansion House (chairman, Dr. Cummings). Chamber concert by the London String Quartet, with the following provisional programme:

Phantasy for String Quartet	Waldo Warner
Miniature Suite	Hubert Bath
Pianoforte Quartet	Wolstenholme
New Songs	London Ronald

MISS CARRIE TUBB.

December 31.—Paper on 'Incidental music,' by Mr. Norman O'Neill, with illustrations by the Haymarket Theatre Orchestra. Orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, conducted by Sir Frederic Cowen. Programme:

Orchestral work	O'Neill
Conducted by the COMPOSER.
Ballad for baritone and orchestra, 'The outlaw'	William Wallace
Conducted by the COMPOSER.
Elegie and Rondo for violin and orchestra	Emil Saurer
Soloist—The COMPOSER.
'A phantasy of life and love'	Coven
Pianoforte concerto	Esposito
Soloist—The COMPOSER.
'The legend beautiful'	James Lyon
Conducted by the COMPOSER.

January 1.—Papers by Mr. F. Roscoe and Mr. A. Kalisch. Chamber concert of music for harps, strings and wind instruments, &c. Harpist, Miss Miriam Timothy.

January 2.—Annual general meeting. Annual banquet.

A Musical Society has been formed at Attleborough, Norfolk, under the presidency of the Earl of Albemarle. Mr. Herbert Hill is conductor. Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus' has been chosen for the Society's first public performance.

FOLK-SONG AND DANCE.

Mr. Cecil Sharp does not have much respite between his heavy duties connected with the Summer School of Folk-Song and Dance, at Stratford-on-Avon, the recommencement of his lectures, and the ordinary work for the English Folk-Dance Society.

Classes for Folk Dancing started at the beginning of October, in various districts of London, and such is the growing demand for tuition that the Society's teachers have been engaged to take charge of large classes held weekly at Ashford, Braxted, Brighton, Enfield, Hounslow, Millwall, and Uxbridge, all in addition to the classes organized by the secretaries of the many branches of the Society all over the country. Early in October Mr. Sharp held a meeting at Cirencester; and at Gloucester, where he lectured, the movement has taken strong root. At the Blackpool Festival, which opened on October 13, Mr. Sharp gave a display of dances with a few of his helpers, which delighted a huge audience. On October 25, Mr. Sharp was announced to lecture at Bath and Bristol, with the assistance of a full team of picked men and women dancers, and in November he is to give similar demonstrated lectures at Nottingham, Leicester, and Market Harboro'.

Mr. Sharp is also booked to conduct meetings at Watford, Cambridge, Lincoln, Holloway College, and other places.

On December 27, the Christmas Vacation School re-opens for a week, at Stratford-on-Avon.

THE NATIONAL BRASS BAND FESTIVAL.

This popular annual event took place at the Crystal Palace on September 27, with even more than its wonted success. Two hundred bands competed, with a total membership of about six thousand, and there was the customary huge attendance of keen listeners. A new departure, welcome probably to competitors and certainly to audiences, was the dropping of the dreary operatic fantasia as championship test-piece in favour of a specially written work. This was a tone-poem by Percy E. Fletcher, entitled 'Labour and Love,' in which we have a musical picture of a purposeless discontented man changed by love of his wife and children into a strenuous, happy worker. The subject was dealt with by the composer in a direct manner, welcome in these days of super-subtleties, and the result was a thoroughly enjoyable work. It was admirably played by most of the bands, the neat attack, strong rhythmic feeling and well-graded nuances being as usual the outstanding merits. The occasional tendency to over-emphasis was perhaps inevitable in the case of players who are bent on scoring marks. A more serious fault was the quickening of the tempi in bars where nothing more exciting than a sustained note was to be played. The result was an occasional loss of weight, and a feeling that the players were looking ahead to the next purple patch rather than conscientiously dealing with the business at hand. The winners in the championship section (twenty-three entries) were Irwell Springs, with St. Hilda Colliery, Black Dike Mills, Crosfield's Soap Works, Brighouse and Rastrick, Kettering Town, and Shaw next in order of merit. The Grand Shield was won by Irwell Old. The usual massed band concert, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Iles, took place in the evening. The delegates from Australia, New Zealand, and the United States who attended with a view of studying British methods in such contests were no doubt impressed by the remarkably fine playing. Also they may have asked the not unnatural question 'Where are the London brass bands?' They may continue to ask.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Mr. Arnold Bax's output of music is not extensive, but it is always of good quality. The two works heard on September 23 for the first time, again revealed the thoughtfulness and sensitiveness characteristic of his music. 'Pensive twilight,' whether or no it effectively conjured up visions of evening calm, was a delightful piece of tone-painting. The 'Dance of the wild Irrevell' was highly suggestive if less significant as music. In both works the ear was attracted by the delicate use of an individual orchestral technique.

Ravel's tricky 'Valse nobles et sentimentales' were heard here for the first time on the orchestra on September 25. It was easier to admire their ingenuity and to tire of their rhythm than to discover their nobility or sentimentality. Some valuable talent as a composer was shown on September 30 by Mr. Georges Dorlay, a member of the orchestra, whose 'Concerto Passioné' for violoncello and orchestra was played by Mr. C. Warwick-Evans, the leader of the violoncellists. His music shows a melodic and decorative instinct, a sound technical gift, and imagination that should lead to good things. On October 2, after a performance of Stravinsky's Suite, 'L'Oiseau de feu,' a selection from Mr. G. H. Clutsam's opera, 'King Harlequin,' recently produced at Berlin, was submitted to English judgment for the first time. If the bulk is according to sample, German critics should have a heightened opinion of the possibilities of English music. The Introduction to Act 3 was full of vivacity both of idea and manner, and the dance which followed had originality and an insinuating charm. Mr. Havergal Brian's Overture, 'Dr. Merryheart,' one of the successes of the Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Birmingham in January, was given on October 7, and again appealed with its innate strength.

No more pleasing work has been introduced this season than Herr Dohnányi's 'Suite' for orchestra in F sharp, heard for the first time on October 9. The opening number, a set of Variations, did not promise all that the later pages revealed, although it was never dull. The second—a slow movement—had instantaneous charm; it is fancy-free music, well shaped and well scored. The exuberant Finale made great effect with its freshness and vitality, which flowed without interruption from beginning to end. The work was repeated by general desire on October 22. The programme on October 9 included Mr. Ernest Austin's excellent Variations for string orchestra on 'The Vicar of Bray.'

On October 14, an 'Idyll' by Mr. Eric Coates was heard for the first time, and gave evident pleasure to the large audience. In this, as in the other works already heard, the composer shows himself able to write music which is light, yet refined and musicianly. While one generally knows what is coming next, it is so pleasant on arrival that one does not complain. The effect of the full orchestra for the climax left one with the impression that Mr. Coates had given them all something to do merely because they were on the spot. The music is not such as to demand such resources.

The most interesting feature of the concert on October 16 was not the novelty, Richard Mandl's 'Hymn to the rising sun,' which was just pleasant hearing, but Delius's admirable Pianoforte concerto in C minor, as played by M. Theodor Szanto. Mr. Harry Keyser's Preludes to Acts 4 and 5 of 'Othello,' heard on the same evening, exercised considerable charm.

Mr. Percy Pitt's 'Aria for strings,' heard on October 21, is an essay in sober, almost sombre, simplicity and, as such, is a well-conceived piece of music. On this evening the programme included Strauss's 'Don Quixote,' which was performed with exceptional clearness and significance. Mr. C. Warwick-Evans interpreted the violoncello solo admirably.

MR. CHARLES FRY'S RECITAL.

Mr. Charles Fry, the well-known elocutionist, gave a recital of exceptional interest at Steinway Hall on October 21. The programme consisted of recitations with musical accompaniment, and was prefaced by a few remarks on the association of music with speech. Mr. Fry and his musical helpers certainly showed a thorough command of the art of combining the two. There was none of the annoyance of divided attention. Among the various numbers in the programme Poe's 'The Bells,' with Mr. Stanley Hawley's music; Poe's 'The Raven,' with music by Mr. Arthur Bergh; and Longfellow's 'King Robert of Sicily,' with music by Mr. John E. West, deserve special mention. The music was provided by Madame Blanche Newcombe (vocalist), Miss Maude Dixon (pianoforte), Miss Gladys Plater (violin), Miss Mary Bridson (violoncello), and Mr. F. W. Belchamber (organ).

THE COMING SEASON IN LONDON.

CHORAL CONCERTS (SUPPLEMENTARY LIST).

Purley Choral Union (Mr. Harold Macpherson)—A tale of Old Japan; Elijah.
St. Anne's (Soho) Choral Society (Mr. H. Bromley Derry)—Hiawatha, I and II.; Merrie England (German).
Turnbridge Wells Vocal Association (Mr. W. W. Starmer)—Golden Legend; From the Bavarian Highlands; part-songs (Starmer).
West Norwood Choral and Orchestral Society—The Messiah.
The Teachers' Musical and Dramatic Society (Surbiton), (Mr. Phil Macdonald)—Merrie England (German).
Bromley Choral Society (Mr. Frederic Fertel)—Hiawatha; The Messiah.
Mansfield House Choral Society (Canning Town), (Mr. C. E. Coward)—13th Psalm (Mendelssohn); The Messiah.

London Concerts.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The opening concert of the 1913-14 series of Symphony concerts took place on October 18. The orchestra was increased for the occasion to 110, six of the newcomers being ladies. There was a large audience, and the programme was of exceptional interest. It included Scriabin's Symphony No. 3, in C major (Op. 43), 'The divine poem'—this being its first performance in England. It is a pity that our acquaintance with the composer's music began at the wrong end, his 'Prometheus,' which caused a sensation last season, having been written more recently than 'The divine poem.' Those of the audience who anticipated a discordant assault on their ears were disappointed, as the work is mostly quite attractive. Played without a break—its three movements are joined together—it takes some fifty minutes in performance, and gives one the impression of suffering somewhat from over-repetition. The themes are unexpectedly tuneful and the scoring brilliant enough in places, without giving us anything startling. The elaborate philosophical basis of the work need not be taken into account. The Symphony stands or falls as music, and judged as such it may be set down as an enjoyable work which would please even more if slightly shorter. It was well received, though there was no wild enthusiasm. The rest of the programme consisted of Dvorák's B minor Violoncello concerto, beautifully played by Señor Casals, Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture to 'Ivan the Terrible,' and Sir Henry Wood's Orchestral transcription of Bach's Organ Toccata in F.

The Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society opened their season on October 4 with a double triumph. The Lord Mayor of London attended in state, and the performance of 'Elijah' given under Mr. Allen Gill was as great as in the history of the Society. The unity of this huge choir, both in expression and execution, was remarkably demonstrated, and in consequence every effect went home, and the appeal to ear and mind was deep. Good solo work was done by Miss Laura Evans, Miss Helen Blair, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Stewart Gardner, and good service by Mr. G. D. Cunningham at the organ.

Miss Gwynne Kimpton opened her fourth series of Orchestral Concerts for Young People at Æolian Hall on October 11 with an instructive programme, and a large audience ready to be instructed. Mr. Stewart Macpherson gave a preliminary lecture on the music, which included a Symphony in G major by Haydn, Mozart's G major Pianoforte concerto (played by Miss Fanny Davies), Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer night's dream' Overture, and part of German's 'Gipsy Suite.' Songs were given by Miss Dorothea Crompton. The next concert will take place on November 8.

The season of the Classical Concert Society opened at Bechstein Hall on October 15, in the presence of a large audience. Señor Pablo Casals, with his unequalled execution of Bach's music for unaccompanied violoncello, was the chief among many attractions. Miss Johanne Stockmarr (pianist) and Mr. Charles Draper (clarinettist) assisted in supplying an interesting programme.

The second programme of the series was mainly classical, the instrumental works being Mozart's Pianoforte trio in G, Schumann's in D minor and Beethoven's Pianoforte sonata in E, Op. 109. The players were Miss Adila von Arany (violinist), Miss May Mukle (violincellist) and Miss Fanny Davies (pianist). Songs were given by Dr. Henschel. Where everything was of the highest, the audience naturally expressed ready approval.

RECITALS.

The London Concert season proper opened at Queen's Hall on September 27, with a violin recital by M. Mischa Elman. Little can be said of his playing that has not often been said before. It yields to none of the dangers that beset its development, for it shows no leaning to virtuosity, the coldly classic manner, or sentimentality. Its expression was pure and strong in Beethoven's G minor Sonata, Max Bruch's D minor Concerto, and Ernst's 'Othello' Fantasia. Mr. Percy Kahn was his accompanist.

On October 4 a recital was given at Queen's Hall by Herr Kreisler, who again astonished and captivated all by the exhilaration and purity of his style. According to his frequent custom, his programme favoured the older style of violin music, in which he stands most clearly pre-eminent as executant and interpreter. It included Bach's Suite in E major, Wieniawski's second Concerto, and works by Corelli, Leclair, Porpora, and Tartini. Mr. Haddon Squire accompanied.

The third recital of the season was worthy to be compared with its predecessors, for it was given by Mr. Harold Bauer, who appeared at Bechstein Hall on October 6. The breadth and depth of his style were best shown in classical works of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven; he created a fine sense of poetry in Chopin, and his eclecticism and adaptability were shown in his playing of music by Ravel and Debussy. On October 13 Mr. Bauer joined Mr. Jacques Thibaud in an admirable joint-recital at Bechstein Hall. They are accustomed to playing together, and their performances of Brahms's D minor Sonata and Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata left nothing wanting. Mr. Bauer leaves shortly for a tour in America and Australia.

The recital given by Madame Carreño at Queen's Hall, on October 8, was also an occasion of farewell, for she is about to depart on a two years' tour. What the British public will miss in that period was shown by her magnificent performances of Beethoven's 'Appassionata' Sonata, Brahms's 'Variations on a theme of Handel,' and by her exquisite interpretation of Chopin.

The growing prodigy, Florizel von Reuter, showed growing powers at Queen's Hall on October 9, when he gave a concert with the assistance of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood.

More than average ability was displayed by two pianists who gave their first recitals here at Bechstein Hall on October 20—Miss Doris Barnett, of Australia, and Mr. John Thompson, of Pennsylvania. Miss Guy Handcock, a violinist who appeared at Bechstein Hall on the following day, showed promising powers.

Interesting recitals have taken place at the Crystal Palace recently, well-known artists being engaged to appear on Saturday afternoons. On October 11 Melsa, and on October 18 Mischa Elman, provided the chief attractions.

Recitals were given by Miss Lena Sykes (pianist) at Bechstein Hall on October 8, Mr. Paul Draper (vocalist) at Bechstein Hall on October 9 and 16, Mr. Leonard Rayner (a proficient pianist) at Bechstein Hall on October 11, Mr. Archy Rosenthal (pianist) at Æolian Hall on October 13 and 20, Miss Geertruida Vogel (vocalist) at Æolian Hall on October 15, Mr. Pachmann (pianist) at Queen's Hall on October 15, and Mr. Arthur Alexander (pianist) at Æolian Hall, October 22.

A chamber concert of Miss Margaret Meredith's works took place at Queen's Hall on October 20, the programme including a Quintet in E flat minor for pianoforte, violin, flute, clarinet, and violoncello, and a scene from Act 2 of the opera 'The pilgrim's way.' There were also songs and violin music. The refinement, simplicity, and placidity of Mrs. Meredith's style are familiar, and in this selection they were once more exemplified to good effect. The artists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Charles Mott (vocalists), Miss May Mukle (violoncellist), Miss Edith Penville (flautist), Mr. Charles Draper (clarinetist), and M. Jacques Thibaud (violinist).

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The brothers Isola and M. P. B. Gheusi have been jointly appointed managers of the Opéra-Comique, with the eminent conductor, M. Paul Vidal, as musical manager, M. Albert Carré taking charge of the Comédie-Française. The successor to MM. Isola at the Gaité-Lyrique is not yet known.—The succession of MM. Messenger and Broussan at the Grand-Opéra is open. Among the candidates are the former manager, M. Gailhard, and M. Jacques Rouché.—The programme of the Opéra for the coming season comprises works by MM. Philippe Gaubert, Alfred Bachelet, and Gabriel Dupont; at the Opéra-Comique the first novelty is to be M. Trépard's 'Céleste'; M. Alfred Bruneau's new lyric-drama, 'Les Quatre Journées,' will be produced during the season.—An Overture written by Saint-Saëns in 1854, and 'published without any change except that the trumpets and French horn parts have been transposed in accordance with modern practice,' formed on October 19 an attractive item at the Concerts Colonne.—Saint-Saëns is to appear as pianist and as organist at a charity concert on November 6.—'Parsifal' is to be produced almost simultaneously at the Opéra and at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées. The first performance at the former theatre is to take place on Thursday, January 1, the latter following suit on January 12.—Rumours have circulated here that the famous author of 'Le Sacre du Printemps' had suddenly become insane and has been shut up in a Petersburg asylum. M. Stravinsky, who is peacefully finishing his new opera-score at Clarens (Switzerland), has telegraphed to MM. Calvocoressi and Vuillemoz to put an end to the mystification.—M. André Pirro's course at the Sorbonne will be devoted this year to the Bach family.—M. Maurice Ravel is writing a work on Basque folk-tunes, for pianoforte and orchestra.—The library of the Opéra has recently been enriched by the following autograph scores: Saint-Saëns's 'Henri VIII,' D'Indy's 'Fervaal,' Chabrier's 'Briséis,' Hillemecher's 'Orsola,' Hue's 'Le Miracle,' Le Borne's 'La Catalane.'—Debussy has just completed the score of a miniature ballet entitled 'La Boîte à Joujoux,' the subject of which is by M. A. Hellé.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST.

Before the beginning of their regular season the Philharmonic Society gave two extra concerts on October 10 and 11, for the purpose of raising funds to discharge a small debt which had accumulated. The work chosen was the ever-fresh 'Elijah,' and two overflowing audiences proved the public interest in the work and the Society. The cast of artists was an excellent one, with Madame Carrie Tubb and Mr. Herbert Brown as soprano and bass respectively. Lord Shaftesbury, the president of the Society, most kindly undertook the tenor part, which he sang with artistic finish and devotional feeling. The alto part was entrusted to a débutante, Miss Norah Scott, the daughter of a member of the Society's choir, who has been studying under Mr. Visetti. She possesses a fine voice, and sang with much taste and finish. Mr. J. Godfrey Brown, the conductor, took infinite pains in training the very large choir, to many of whom the work was new, and the entirely local band. The result was in all respects excellent, and the general verdict of audience and Press was that the performance of the work was the finest ever given at Belfast.

BIRMINGHAM.

Although the public was blind to the fact, the Denhof operatic season at Birmingham was artistically an unequalled success, especially as regards the orchestra, which was the finest combination yet heard in opera in this city. The novelties, 'Elektra,' 'Pelleas and Melisande,' and 'Rosenkavalier,' did not draw the expected audiences, and the splendid revival of Mozart's 'Magic Flute' had but few supporters. Of special interest to local opera-goers was the first appearance of our tenor Mr. Frank Mullings in the part of Tristan, for he achieved a veritable triumph both histrionically and vocally; indeed he is likely to hold in the near future a high position as a Wagnerian tenor on the English operatic stage.

The local musical season has started well, and first in the field were the Birmingham Choral Union, who gave a popular performance of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' in the Town Hall on October 4, under Mr. Richard Wassell's excellent conductorship. The admirable singing of the choral numbers strongly testified to the care bestowed on their preparation, the choir realising an evenly balanced tone and sense of rhythm and expression: indeed a finer performance has rarely been heard from our local amateur choral Societies. The orchestra, so great a factor in this work, was specially excellent in the strings, the whole of the orchestral score being executed with much skill, giving to the performance a distinct cachet of its own. Miss Eva Rich, Miss Nellie Chisholm, Mr. John Hinde, and Mr. John Ridding ably filled their respective rôles in the Cantata. Mr. C. W. Perkins was of course a reliable and painstaking organist.

The song recital given by Mr. Rutland Boughton in the Temperance Hall on September 30 was of more than ordinary interest, inasmuch as Mr. Boughton had provided a somewhat exceptional programme in which he had the lion's share, for he sang and accompanied almost throughout the evening. He certainly imparted to his singing a declamatory style of great attractiveness, his diction being a feature of his art. The programme contained a number of Irish and Hebridean folk-songs, as well as compositions of his own, and songs by Hubert Parry, Ethel Smyth, Gustav von Holst, Loewe, Purcell, Edgar Bainton, and Roger Quilter. He was assisted by Miss Muriel Boughton and Mr. Arthur Jordan, both artists being gifted with excellent voices.

The first of five chamber concerts organized for the current season was given by the Birmingham Chamber Concerts Society at Queen's College on October 8, the executants being the Arthur Catterall String Quartet, one of the finest combinations of the kind in this country. Their programme contained Richard Strauss's early String quartet, Op. 2, in A major; and Beethoven's String quartet, Op. 59, No. 1, in F major—the first of the three dedicated to Count Rasoumofsky. Perfect unanimity, beauty of tone, and artistic phrasing characterized their performance, and no one could have wished to hear more evenly-balanced interpretations.

The first Harrison Concert of the season was given in the Town Hall on October 6, the chief attraction being Madame Tetrassini, who on this occasion made her fifth appearance at these concerts. For the first time she essayed songs by Grieg and Brahms, sung to Italian words with strange effect. Of course she was best in 'Ah fors e lui,' given with her customary brilliance, her voice reaching E flat in alt with perfect ease and beauty of timbre. With her were associated Madame Paola St. Clair, Mr. Arthur Brooke, and Mr. Felix Fleischer. M. Jean Gerardy was solo violoncellist, and Madame Ruby Holland solo pianist, the accompanist being Mr. R. J. Forbes.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's first concert of the season took place at the Town Hall on October 9, the programme submitted comprising Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and Elgar's oratorio 'The dream of Gerontius.' An impressive performance was given of the Symphony, a work that always meets with the approval of local audiences. Dr. Sinclair has interpreted 'The dream of Gerontius' many times since his appointment as conductor to this Society, on the death of Dr. Swinnerton Heap, but one cannot call to mind a more expressive and deeply-felt all round performance than he gave on this occasion. Indeed Dr. Sinclair seemed in his best mood, and the executants were on their mettle, for rarely has one heard such expressive singing from our premier choristers; the orchestra, too, shared the enthusiasm, and no fault could be found with their graphic interpretation of the wonderful orchestral score. Miss Phyllis Lett's beautiful voice was eminently suited for the pathetic strains allotted to the Angel, to which she did complete justice. There is hardly any need to point out what Mr. John Coates can do with the title part. He was in excellent voice, and has rarely sung better. Mr. Herbert Brown in the dual part of the Priest and Angel of the Agony created an excellent impression not only by his sonorous and telling voice, but also by his expressive style of vocalism. To Mr. C. W. Perkins fell again the important part assigned to the organist.

A vocal recital was given at Queen's College on October 13 by Madame Marie Ravault, who sang with excellent diction songs by Bach, Pergolesi, Schumann, Wagner, Dvorák, Hugo Wolf, Godard, &c. She also appeared as pianist, and joined Mr. T. Henry Smith in a fine performance of César Franck's Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin. Mr. Clarence Raybould accompanied with consummate art.

BOURNEMOUTH.

So much of importance attaches to the opening of the new season that only brief reference can be made to the concluding fixtures of the old. But space must be found to record the visit of Melsa and party, whose interesting recital was somewhat marred by the rather uneventful quality of the programme; the brilliant and spirited performance by Miss Adela Verne of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto, a composition which surely needs a long rest; the playing by Kreiser of the Beethoven Violin concerto, the excellences of which were not quite so prominent as usual, partly by reason of a faulty E string; and lastly, the weekly Symphony Concerts, whose high standard was fully maintained by creditable performances of Dvorák's 'Carneval' Overture and Slavonic Dances, Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony and 'Magic Flute' Overture, Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony and Rindino for woodwind and horns, Elgar's 'Wand of youth' Suite (No. 2), Brahms's C minor Symphony, and Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un Faune'—to mention the principal items; while songs by Mr. J. H. Scotland and instrumental solos by Mr. F. King-Hall and Mr. Montague Birch, respectively the leader of the Orchestra and the Winter Gardens accompanist, accommodated those hearers who have a penchant for the individualistic side of music.

A violin recital on October 4 by Mischa Elman (assisted by Miss Alice Lakin and Mr. Percy B. Kahn) marked the beginning of the autumn season proper. Allusion has been made above to the comparative weakness of design of Melsa's programme, and it must be regretfully admitted that Elman's was equally undistinguished. It is truly pitiable that a performer of such great gifts should waste them on such twaddle as a Rossini-Ernest transcription and its like, while innumerable fine sonatas that were written for the great players are passed over.

October 15 was a red-letter day for Bournemouth, Mr. John Coates, assisted by Miss May Mukle, giving one of the most delightful recitals of recent years. The audience, alas! was lamentably sparse. A really artistic singer is a rara avis so far as this town is concerned, and few musical centres are so ignorant of the great examples in song.

The nineteenth series of Symphony Concerts made a highly auspicious commencement on October 9, when first performances at these concerts of Elgar's first Symphony and Liszt's 'Todtentanz,' for pianoforte and orchestra (most dexterously played by Mr. Arthur Cooke), were given, along with an old favourite in Weber's 'Der Freischütz' Overture. The week following, Brahms's magnificent E minor Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous 'Scheherazade' Suite—also a first performance at the Symphony Concerts—and Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' for violin and orchestra, charmingly played by Mr. Albert Sammons, filled the bill. Excellent performances of all these works were forthcoming, that of the complex Elgar Symphony being a distinct feat. We would add that our admirable conductor, Mr. Dan Godfrey, is once more at the helm—indeed, one can hardly conceive the Bournemouth Symphony Concerts without him—and that the personnel of the Orchestra is almost unchanged from last year. The analytical programme notes are now being supplied by Mr. Hamilton Law (co-director with Mrs. Farnell-Watson of the Bournemouth School of Music) in succession to Mr. Allan Biggs.

Equally as inviting, in their own individual way, as the Symphony Concerts, are the Monday 'Pops,' a series which makes a very varied appeal. The first was devoted to Wagner, the programme consisting of the 'Kaisermarsch'; the 'Flying Dutchman' Overture; the Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan und Isolde'; the Preislied ('Die Meistersinger'), arranged for violin and orchestra, and capitolly played by Mr. Algernon Holland, probably the most expressive player in the string section of the Municipal Orchestra; the Introduction to Act 3, 'Lohengrin'; 'Siegfried Idyll'; the Introduction to Act 3, 'Dance of the Apprentices,' and 'Homage to Hans Sachs' ('Die Meistersinger'); and the 'Ride of the Valkyries.' A 'Saint-Saëns' programme was presented at the second concert, of which the principal items were the symphonic-poem 'Le Rouet d'Omphale' and the aria 'Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix,' sung with hardly sufficient dramatic emphasis by Miss Verena Fancourt.

BRISTOL.

On September 29, the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society opened their season under the direction of Mr. George Riseley. They took in hand pieces for a concert which they had promised to give at Gloucester for the benefit of the Commercial Travellers' Association, similar to a performance by the Bristol Choir in 1910. Among the productions in the scheme are some by Dr. A. H. Brewer and Mr. C. Lee Williams, who will conduct them. At this meeting of the Society a resolution of congratulation to Mr. Fred Painter was directed to be sent by the secretary (Mr. J. F. W. Tratman). Mr. Painter, a native of Bristol, was a former member of the Society, but some time since removed to London, and has now taken office as one of the Sheriffs for the City of London.

A concert was given on October 1, at the schoolroom of Cotham Wesleyan Church, by the Earl Street Choir, under Mr. C. E. Leonard. The cantata 'Jonah,' by A. J. Jamouneau, was performed, the soloists being Miss Elsie White, Miss N. Peacock, Mr. W. Cunningham, and Mr. A. S. Prideaux, and the accompaniments were played by Miss Irene Orton (pianoforte) and Mr. C. R. Leonard (organ). The performance afforded gratification to a large audience.

On October 14, Miss Maud Wingate, who has attained a local reputation as violinist, pianist, and composer, gave a concert at the New Church, Cranbrook Road. She had the assistance of Miss Maudie Stephens (violin), Miss Joan Dalrymple, Miss I. Shergold, and Miss Peggy Andrews (vocalists). Some songs composed by Miss Wingate were pleasingly interpreted.

The Rayman Quintet—consisting of Miss Avice Sealy, Miss Hilda Barr (violin), Miss Gladys Home (viola), Miss Evelyn Pullen (violoncello), and Miss May Thomas (pianoforte)—gave a concert on October 16, at the Victoria Rooms, with a programme that included Mr. Frank Bridge's 'Three Idylls,' Mozart's Quartet in D major, and Brahms's Trio in C major, Op. 87.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The newly-formed Three Towns Madrigal Society, with Dr. Harold Lake as conductor, has made a start, and is in full swing of training. Its objective is the cultivation of unaccompanied singing, and while the best of old madrigals will receive first attention, modern works and glees will also be studied. For the third season of their Musical Matinees, the Misses Smith have shown by their wide catering that they anticipate a larger success even than they have hitherto attained. Dr. Georg Henschel has promised to sing once more at these concerts, before starting his farewell tour in Holland. The English String Quartet—Mr. Percy Grainger, Miss May Mukle, and the Misses Florence and Lily Smith—will be the instrumentalists, and Mrs. Elsie Swinton and Madame Amy Dewhurst the vocalists.

A private club, evolved out of meetings at a private house, has been formed at Mutley for the cultivation of chamber music. It will be known as 'The Extempore Chamber Music Club,' and the funds derived from membership will be exclusively devoted to the purchase of music. The playing members will continue to be Messrs. R. Ball, A. Coombe, J. L. Fouracre, C. G. Pike, and Dr. H. Lake.

On September 24, Mr. Reginald Waddy gave his farewell organ recital in Emmanuel Church. The Cecilian Male Choir gave a concert at Devonport on October 1, Mr. T. Downing conducting. On the first Saturday in October the Plymouth Corporation concerts entered on a new series under the organization of Mr. H. Moreton, borough organist. The Mayor and Corporation attended, the programme being provided by Miss Amy Simpson, Mr. Sydney Heywood, Miss Edna Vaughan Sparkes (violin), and the organist. Under the same auspices the orchestral combination of the Royal Garrison Artillery, whose conductor is Mr. R. G. Evans, gave a finely-performed programme, including the B minor Symphony of Schubert, on October 18.

A choir of sixty voices sang Maunder's 'A song of thanksgiving' in Ebrington Street United Methodist Church on October 5. Mr. W. Quilter conducted, with Mr. Leonard Biscombe at the organ. The 'ladies' night' (a new departure) given by the Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir on October 10, proved very enjoyable. The choir sang in very finished and expressive style, under Mr. David Parkes. The performance of the cantata 'City of gold,' by the Crownhill (Holy Trinity) Church choir on October 8 was an ambitious attempt which they fully justified. Outside friends assisted, and Mr. W. Biggs conducted.

Under the auspices of Mr. Percy Harrison, working through Messrs. Moon & Sons, Madame Tetrizzini and M. Jean Gerardy and party gave a concert at Plymouth on September 30 to a crowded audience.

A fortnight's opera season has probably been unknown at Plymouth until this year, but crowded houses have been the rule for every performance which the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company have given from October 6—18. The outstanding features of the programme have been two performances in English of 'The Jewels of the Madonna,' two of 'The magic flute,' and one of 'Mignon.' 'Carmen,' 'Faust,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Tannhäuser,' and two ballad operas have completed the scheme, which has been artistically and popularly successful.

The popular regiment known as 'The Gay Gordons' (1st Battalion Gordon Highlanders), who have recently come into barracks at Crownhill, gave their first public band performance in the pier pavilion on October 15, under Mr. E. R. Pallant, bandmaster.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The concert season opened at Exeter on September 24 with a recital by Mr. Kreisler, in which the chief item was an accompanied Suite in E by Bach. At Torquay in the evening of the same day Mr. Kreisler gave his unique interpretation of the Beethoven Concerto, with the Municipal Orchestra, Mr. Basil Hindenberg conducting.

At Okehampton, on September 24, Miss Olive Beard played Mendelssohn's first Concerto for pianoforte, Mr. Percy Lowman played violin pieces, and songs were sung by Miss Maud Tellam, Mrs. B. Newcombe, Mr. C. J. Turner, and the Rev. T. G. B. Price. The University Extension Guild at Exeter, hoping to clear off the debt resting on their finances, secured the services as essayist and demonstrator of Mr. Hubert Terry, who on September 30 discussed Mozart before a large audience. The first movement from the G minor Symphony was played by a capable little band under the lecturer's direction, and solo artists assisted.

Chamber music was given at Barnstaple on September 29, when Dr. H. J. Edwards, Miss A. Sealy, and Miss F. Prior played a Saint-Saëns Pianoforte trio.

The Congregational Church choir at Newton Abbot sang Gaul's 'Ruth' on October 13, conducted by Mr. S. Pochin, with Mr. A. O. Crocker at the organ.

A ladies' choir of fifty voices, assisted by a ladies' orchestra conducted by Mr. F. J. Shapcott, gave a concert at Exeter on October 16.

The first year's working of the Torquay Municipal Pavilion has closed with a loss of over £1,600; but this is not regarded as unsatisfactory. The advantages which the town has reaped in other ways from the fame achieved by the Municipal Orchestra, and the very fine work done by Mr. Basil Hindenberg as conductor, are considered more than worth the cost, and it is not proposed to curtail their efforts.

CORNWALL.

The cantata 'King Harold' was sung by St. Austell Musical Society on October 9, conducted by Mr. S. D. Collins, and miscellaneous choruses and part-songs were also given. Assistance rendered by an orchestra conducted by Mr. J. Huddy was appreciated.

Devoran Choral Society, conducted by Mr. W. Cock, on October 18 sang pieces with which they had won a shield and certificate at the county music competitions, and also gave an excellent performance of 'Lauda Sion.'

At their annual meeting Mr. W. Brennand Smith was re-elected conductor of St. Blazey and Par Choral Society, and a resolution was passed to enter for the next county competitions after giving a miscellaneous concert at Christmas. A small credit balance was reported at the annual meeting of Tywardreath Choral Society, of which Mr. W. Brennand Smith is also conductor. With regret it must be announced that Liskeard Choral Society have decided to 'close down' for twelve months. The difficulty lay in the fact that the public did not appreciate the good music which alone would attract members, and there was a considerable deficit on the accounts. Mr. Walter Weekes had been the conductor, and the president carefully explained that the Society must not be regarded as defunct; the able officers would remain in office, but operations would be in abeyance. A much more gratifying account of things was given at the annual outing of Bodmin Philharmonic Society, where financial balance and membership were stated to be both on the increase. This Society, whose director is Mr. R. Glendinning, have steadily maintained a high standard both in music selected and in performance.

EDINBURGH.

The season opened here with a visit of Madame Carreño on October 4. A week later Mr. Burnett gave his annual song recital, which is now regarded as one of the events of the season. A Chappell ballad concert on October 13 led one to believe that audiences at Edinburgh are not so easily attracted to that type of concert as they used to be. Tetrizzini on October 18 drew an audience which filled to overflowing the McEwan Hall. The other artists were Gerardy (violinello), as perfect as ever, Ruby Holland (pianist), Arthur Brooke, Paola St. Clair, and Felix Fleischer (vocalists). On October 20 Miss Lunn (violinist), assisted by Philip Halstead (pianist) and John Linden (violinellist), gave a recital of Trios by Mozart and Schubert for these instruments.

The University Historical Concerts will be four in number. At the first, pianoforte quintets will be played by Mr. Philip Halstead and the Verbrugghen Quartet; at the second, vocal quartets will be sung by the Foxton Ferguson Quartet party; at the third, pianoforte and harpsichord compositions (Bach and Mozart) will be given by Madame Wanda Landowska; and the fourth programme will consist of old English viol music.

It is very gratifying that arrangements are completed for the Denhof Operatic Festival to take place in the King's Theatre on November 17 to 29, under the direction of Mr. Thomas Beecham.

GLASGOW.

The following is a supplementary list of prospective programmes:—University Choral Society (Mr. A. M. Henderson), Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' the epilogue from Elgar's 'Caractacus,' Tchaikovsky's eight-part motet, 'Angel Spirits ever blessed,' and part-songs and madrigals; Teachers' Choral Society (Mr. H. S. Munro), part-songs and a short work yet to be chosen; Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. B. W. Hartley), miscellaneous pieces; Hamilton Choral Union (Mr. T. S. Drummond), Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius'; Springburn Choral Union (Mr. B. W. Hartley)—a newly-formed choir, the direct outcome of the Choral Festival movement—the 'Messiah,' Mr. G. T. Pattman is forming an amateur choir to co-operate with the professional chorus in 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Götterdämmerung,' and 'The Flying Dutchman,' at the forthcoming Denhof operatic Festival.

The sixtieth season of the City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts (ballad) opened on October 4, when Madame Kirkby Lunn and Dr. Georg Henschel were the leading vocalists. The organ newly erected by Messrs. Harrison & Harrison in Pollokshields Parish Church was opened by Sir Frederick Bridge on September 27. So many people wished to see and hear the genial organist of Westminster Abbey that the church could have been filled twice over.

At a meeting of the general committee of the Choral Competitive Festival very encouraging reports were submitted and office-bearers elected. The 1914 Festival will be held on May 1 and 2, with Dr. Bairstow and Mr. Harry Evans as adjudicators.

The music-makings of the month have included a pianoforte and vocal recital by Madame Carreffo and Miss Elsie Cochrane; pianoforte recitals by two local musicians, Miss Gray and Mr. Charles Davenport; a chamber concert by Messrs. Halskad and Verbruggen; the first Harrison Concert, with Tetrazzini as the chief attraction; and the first of the Bach Choir's Chamber Concerts, at which a programme of exceptional interest was submitted.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

To Mr. Percy Harrison belongs the credit of inaugurating the winter musical season by his concert in the Philharmonic Hall on October 8. Madame Tetrazzini was the principal attraction, and of her brilliant singing the audience seemed never to tire. Indeed the encore fiends were too complaisantly treated, until finally Mr. Harrison had to make a dignified remonstrance which had the desired effect. Another great artist, M. Jean Gerardy, was also heard at his best, and aspirants for fame who acquitted themselves with credit included Miss Paola St. Clair, Mr. Arthur Brooke, Mr. Felix Feilscher, and Miss Ruby Holland (solo pianist), with Mr. R. J. Forbes, an accompanist of perfect tact and unobtrusive skill.

At the first concert of the Philharmonic Society on October 14, M. Safonoff directed a powerful and impressive performance of Schubert's C major Symphony, in which he proved that his powers of interpretation are not confined to music of the Russian School. The Symphony was preceded by the 'Egmont' Overture, also finely played. Novelty was provided in a quaint piece, 'In the Circassian Village,' by Ippolitoff-Ivanoff, music of mainly rhythmic interest, largely helped out by the timpitlo, a primitive instrument of percussion, which consists of two earthenware jars, over the mouths of which skin is tightly stretched and played with light wooden drumsticks. Glazounoff's 'Spring,' while delicately suggestive of its title, does not offer anything particularly new. A work of which the same may be said, although the scoring is much more full-blooded—Hakon Boerresen's Overture 'The Normans,' heard for the first time in England, is a battle-piece of partially sustained interest. The vocalist was Signor Sammarco, who was best heard in the Prologue to 'Pagliacci.' The new resident choral conductor, Mr. Harry Evans, received a significant welcome from the choir as well as the audience upon appearing to conduct the performance of Coleridge-Taylor's characteristic choral ballad 'Beside the ungathered rice he lay,' in which the orchestra helped to make the performance an interesting and effective feature in the programme. The choir is evidently benefiting by the reconstruction process.

The Sheffield Choir of fifty picked singers 'trained to a hair,' which Dr. Henry Coward brought to the Olympia Music Hall on September 22, had every reason to be gratified by the flattering reception they received at each of their performances throughout the week. The splendid singing of a typical selection of English glees, part-songs, and choruses, was listened to with rapt attention even by the galleryites, and provided habitués with a delightful novelty, which it is to be hoped will often be renewed now that Dr. Coward has courageously led the way. The two most popular items sung by the Sheffield Choir were Stewart's 'The bells of St. Michael's Tower' and Barnby's 'Sweet and low.' In Elgar's 'Bavarian Highlands' chorus the singers were effectively supported by the theatre orchestra.

At his first concert in St. George's Hall on October 11, Dr. Adolph Brodsky brought forward a Sonata for violin and pianoforte, by Sylvio Lazzari, a pupil of César Franck, and collaborated with Mr. R. J. Forbes in an able presentation of this melodious and musically work. Two String quartets were also played; Haydn's Quartet in D and Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 59, No. 1. In the absence of Mr. Carl Fuchs, his place was taken by Miss Mary McCullagh, a violoncello player of notable ability.

The Rodewald Concert Club opened their season in the Yamen Rooms on October 13, when Miss Nora Dall and Mr. Frederic Brandon sustained an interesting programme, including a new MS. Pianoforte sonata by Mr. Ernest Bryson. Modern in feeling and individual in expression, the work is that of an independent thinker, and offers the pianist abundant opportunity for the display of virile technique. The composer was especially fortunate in his interpreter, who played from memory, a notable feat of over half-an-hour's duration. Mr. Brandon also played finely in Chopin's Barcarolle and A flat Polonaise. Miss Nora Dall's singing in songs of widely divergent styles was earnest, unaffected, and artistic. She uses her fine voice extremely well.

The Welsh Festival held at the Liverpool Exhibition on September 25 was notable for the visit of the Carnarvon Prize Choir, about 200 strong, of whom the ladies wore the national dress, sugar-loaf hats and red cloaks. Under Mr. John Williams, a selection of choral arrangements of Welsh melodies was sung with expressive and powerful effect. The assembly of 8,000, mainly composed of compatriots residing in this great centre known as the capital of Wales, displayed unbounded enthusiasm, joining in the popular hymn-tune 'Aberystwyth' and 'Land of our fathers,' with full-throated fervour. Among recent events were Mr. Stanley Hawley's exposition of pianoforte notation, and the address given before the meeting of the local section of the I.S.M., on October 11, by Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank, on 'Some sidelights of musical history.' A pianoforte recital was given on October 9, in the Rushworth Hall, by Mr. Roland H. Brewerton, who contributed an excellent performance of Brahms's Ballade in D minor, and on the same evening in the Yamen Rooms, Miss Linda Gibbs gave a dramatic recital in which she was assisted by Miss Gladys Lederer, mezzo-soprano, and by Mr. Josef Greene, a young local pianist of very considerable executive powers. Another interesting occasion was the organ recital in St. Mary's Church for the Blind, given by Dr. C. Charlton Palmer, organist of Canterbury Cathedral, whose programme contained the Finale to Reubke's 94th Psalm Sonata.

At the invitation of the local Education Authority, which has taken over the locally renowned Liverpool Collegiate School, in Shaw Street, a large audience assembled at the re-opening by Mr. Townshend Driffield of the large organ in the College Hall on October 8. This was originally built by Jackson, of Bolton, in 1850, to replace the Philharmonic Society's organ which had been removed from the College to the new Philharmonic Hall in Hope Street. It was originally inaugurated by Henry Smart. As now rebuilt by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper, the organ is a modernized and effective instrument, suitable for concert as well as school use. A proof of the enlightened attitude of the City Council in musical matters is shown by their contribution of £300 towards the cost of the rebuilding.

In connection with the Music Teachers' Association, founded in 1908, an address was given by the hon. secretary, Mr. Arthur J. Hadrill, on September 25, in the Rushworth Hall, explanatory of the Association's aims and objects, which embrace the promotion of progressive ideas upon the teaching of music, especially with a view to the more educative treatment of the subject in schools. Mr. Hadrill laid stress upon the necessity of ear-training from early childhood, and upon singing at sight. The meeting was largely attended, and steps are being taken to form a local branch of the Association.

It would appear however that the Liverpool Teachers' Association does not need urging in this direction and at the present time a voluntary movement is afoot which has the approval of the Education Committee. A minimum of elementary musical knowledge is bound to be given in each school according to the regulations. This has been exceeded in many individual cases by teachers whose heart is in the work. It is now proposed to combine children from a hundred schools into one great choir, after the selected music has been rehearsed by various district groups. It is an effort intended to encourage not only the children but also their responsible teachers in the direction of musical study as part of the general scheme for the improvement of human well-being.

Mr. Alfred Kalisch gave an interesting and instructive lecture on Strauss's operas 'Der Rosenkavalier' and 'Elektra' in the Rushworth Hall, on October 20. The audience, if small, was highly appreciative, for Mr. Kalisch speaks as easily and lucidly as he writes. As the translator of the English version of Hofmannsthal's text he has an intimate knowledge not only of the 'Rosebearer' but also of Strauss's methods in his earlier dramatic works, of which the lecturer's exposition gave the audience food for thought.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

On the eve of probably the most brilliant musical season Manchester has ever experienced, at a time too when the conditions of Lancashire trade had made it more than ever before possible to indulge for a fortnight in the luxury of a high-class opera company, which, alike in its repertory, in the quality of the principal artists, in the completeness of the orchestra, and in the mounting of the operas, left little to be desired, we have undergone an unparalleled humiliation. Half the series of magnificent Denhof performances were withdrawn, because not only was the actual support accorded to the first week so appallingly poor, but the prospective support for the second week ('The Ring' dramas, with 'Meistersinger' and 'Orpheus') was actually fifty per cent. worse! Manchester, famed the wide world over for her cotton and music! Manchester, looked up to as the musical metropolis of the North, with her forty or fifty orchestral concerts per winter, and inclined to regard the famous dictum, 'What Lancashire thinks to-day,' &c., as peculiarly applicable to herself—well may she hang her head in shame!

Some there are who have ever asserted that Manchester's vaunted musical superiority was pure myth: that, at heart, she was woefully, even abysmally, ignorant of the real trend of current musical thought, and they are quite justified now in their 'I told you so' commentaries.

It is no good trying to blink facts. It is true that the Jewish community was unable to accord much support, as Denhof's visit coincided with the Jewish Festival of the New Year: but are there not crowds of wealthy folks outside both our Jewish and German colonies? It is true that Denhof's prices were high for some folks, but they were no higher than on his previous visits (which he declares were profitable). The ugly fact stares us in the face that Manchester's apathy helped to break Ernst Denhof, and with a grim irony Saturday afternoon, October 4, saw our hoardings, which in the morning had proclaimed the performances of Wagnerian opera at the Theatre Royal, announcing instead Oscar Wilde's 'The importance of being earnest,' preceded by 'The call of duty'! Naturally, the correspondence columns, no less than the 'leaders' of our several journals, were full of comments on the situation, and indulged in some very plain talk: 'Manchester boasts of her musical taste, and she is deluding herself with the belief that her devotion to music is what it was years ago. The fact is, Manchester will support performances that Manchester people organize, but will not give her support to what originates elsewhere—surely a qualification which should moderate her self-satisfaction.'

Compared with Leeds, we showed up very badly. Leeds had only recently passed through an expensive Festival week. Denhof says his first visit there showed a profit, but we subscribed less than £600 for 'The Ring' dramas whilst Leeds had booked over twice as much before Denhof played a note of music. The more one reflects on the whole situation the worse it looks, and the news published on October 11, that Beecham had decided to drop the second week of the tour at Liverpool and come here instead, for the period November 3 to 8, does not take away all the sting—for there lingers in the memory the disgraceful support accorded him the night after Elgar's first Symphony was produced here—350 performers on the platform and about 200 folk in the huge Free Trade Hall, one of whom was Frederick Delius, whose 'Sea Drift' was performed. Still, nobody can deny that Beecham has pluck as well as uncommon musical ability, and for the rest nous verrons.

Of these Denhof performances it is difficult to write in other than superlative terms. The scenic settings were all on a lavish scale, without exceeding the bounds of good taste. Schilling-Ziemsden did not impress me as being quite so supple a conductor in Strauss as Cortolezis on a previous tour, but the second performance of 'Rosenkavalier' revealed the former in a more favourable light. The interest taken here in singers who gain concert-experience before operatic skill seems to be greater than in the case of those to whom the reverse conditions would apply—merely proving, perhaps, how behind-hand we are in operatic matters. Very probably the question in the minds of many in the audience was: 'How would Agnes Nicholls, Austin, Gleeson-White, Mullings, or Knowles (say) shape on the stage?' Of these, and others too numerous to mention, it can be said that on the histrionic side of their art they have grown out of all recognition. The orchestra was uncommonly efficient, with abundant youth on its side; the only considerable drawback to fullest enjoyment (especially of those who sat in the stalls and pit) was the proximity of the band, owing to the Theatre Royal's inadequate accommodation for an opera-orchestra. In 'Pelléas and Mélisande' the lighter orchestration did enable the words to get through to the audience. As Pelléas, Mr. Walter Hyde was not quite so 'stagey' as at Birmingham, and Miss Freeman was entirely free from nervousness. It was sufficiently distressing to have Maeterlinck in English that was often very colloquial, but when that English was enunciated in a manner so obviously German, as in the case of Ernest von Pick's Goland, the spell was completely broken. It would hardly appear likely that Schilling-Ziemsden could have any special affinity for his work, and one's impression of the curiously elusive Debussyan orchestral colour suffered by his somewhat too heavy handling. Mr. Thomas Beecham's reading of 'Tristan' was quite astonishing to those unfamiliar with his work (and at Manchester their name is legion), and his readings of the 'Ring' dramas in November will be awaited with expectant interest, as it is understood that he contemplates their production next summer in London.

Saturday, October 4, saw the opening of the concert season with the first of the Manchester Orchestra (Ltd.) Promenade Concerts. Every concert given this month, thus far, has had a crowded attendance, and some people are too ready to accept this as proof conclusive that Manchester is musical, no matter how disgracefully she fails to support opera. On October 11, Mr. Brand Lane began his miscellaneous concert series with a three and a-half hours' programme, in which his Philharmonic Choir, Florence Macbeth, Sammarco, Casals, Marie Hall, and Carreño took part. The opening Hallé concert was entirely orchestral, and consisted of well-known Wagner, Beethoven, and Strauss. A change of some moment has taken place in the ranks of the Orchestra, Mr. Simon Speelman having retired from the leadership of the viola players, his place being taken by Mr. D. Reggel, a member of the Arthur Catterall Quartet, until recently resident at Birmingham.

At the first Harrison concert, Tetrazini in her inimitably sophisticated Italian art, and Felix Fleischer, a thorough-going Teuton, in a severe German work (Schubert's setting of the gigantic Goethe 'Prometheus' poem), provided a sufficiently sharp antithesis. Mr. R. J. Forbes has often set his powers as an accompanist in a high light, but rarely as on this occasion.

Mr. Henri Verbruggen's appearance as conductor at the second Promenade Concert on October 18 was in every way a success. Paying attention to detail, especially in the strings, he secured eminently sane readings of Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Berlioz, Bizet. Dr. Brodsky played Bach's A minor Violin concerto with breadth, dignity, and poetic insight. Those evenings are usually memorable on which Brodsky, Casals, or Siliti play Bach.

The syllabus of the third session of the Greenock Musical Association announces seven lectures on widely differing subjects, a chamber concert (January 27), and a concert by the Glasgow Orpheus Choir (March 11).

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The Middlesbrough Musical Union, continuing the policy of last season, announce four concerts for 1913-14. Two of these are chamber concerts in the Wesley Hall, and the others choral and orchestral concerts in the Town Hall. On October 29 the Flonzaley Quartet gave works by Schubert and Hugo Wolf. Miss Elizabeth Munthe-Kaas was the vocalist, and Mr. Paul Kilburn accompanist. On February 18 next, Miss Fanny Davies, Madame Marie Soldat, and Mr. Percy Hemming will provide the programme. The first choral concert is fixed for December 11, with Max Bruch's 'Fair Ellen' and Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander' as the principal works; and the last, on April 2, will be devoted to Bach's B minor Mass. Mr. Kilburn will conduct, and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra has been engaged for both occasions.

The Sunderland Philharmonic Society ended last season with a balance of £24 2s. 3d. in the hands of the treasurer. For the coming season two concerts are announced: Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' and Bantock's 'Time Spirit' will be given on December 9, and Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' and Gade's 'Spring Message' on April 1.

Owing to the refusal of the Drill Hall authorities to allow any further use of the building for public purposes, the Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society have been obliged to modify their programmes for the coming season to suit the accommodation of the Mechanics' Hall. The first will be a madrigal concert with a solo pianist, violinist, and vocalist, and the second an orchestral concert without any choral works. The Cleveland Harmonic Male-Voice Choir, who won the second prize at the Welsh National Eisteddfod, gave an excellent concert in the Town Hall, Middlesbrough, on Wednesday, October 8. Their programme included Brahms's Rhapsody for alto solo and chorus, Bantock's 'Peace and War,' and Hegar's 'Phantom Host.' Mr. Gavin Kay is the conductor, and the vocalists were Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Grace Matthews, Mr. Julien Henry, and Mr. D. J. Jones.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The season was opened here on October 15, when M. Daniel Melsa was received with the enthusiasm which invariably attends his performances. The other artists were M. Benno Moiseiwitsch (pianist), Miss Antonia Dolores, Miss Mabel Mann, and Mr. Burke Leigh (vocalists).

At Chappell's Ballad Concert on October 15 a popular programme was forthcoming, in which Miss Marjorie Hayward and Mr. Idris Lewis gave a delightful rendering of the 'Humoreske' from York Bowen's Suite in D minor. Mr. Thorpe Bates, Miss Carmen Hill, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, Miss Margaret Cooper, and Miss Louise Dale assisted in making the concert a success.

The Saturday organ recitals at the Albert Hall have commenced for the winter, and Mr. Bernard Johnson is making a speciality of Bach's lesser-known organ compositions in addition to the ordinary miscellaneous works in the programmes.

Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson's 250th organ recital at Halifax Place took place on September 21, when his programme consisted entirely of works written by musicians now occupied in this city, and was as follows: 'Grand Chœur,' by L. Henniker (St. Andrew's Church); 'A morning song,' by Bernard Johnson (Albert Hall); 'Introduction and Allegro,' by Blyton Dobson (Halifax Place); Das 'Wiederkommen,' by E. M. Barber (Halifax Place); 'Pastorale,' by F. Wyatt (St. Thomas's Church).

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The temporary collapse of the Denhof Opera Company at Manchester, and the taking up of the concern by Mr. Thomas Beecham are now matters of history. It was at Sheffield that the tour was resumed, and the gallant way in which the city responded to the bold enterprise of Mr. Beecham deserves more than passing mention.

For several years Sheffield has been regarded by touring opera managers as being off the main line of good business. Mr. Quinlan, Mr. Beecham, and until this autumn, Mr. Denhof have passed over the largest city in Yorkshire in making up their tours. Yet during the past month Sheffield offered abundant proof that, given the right sort of opera, there is a large public ready and eager to support it.

The repertory of the visit comprised 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'Orpheus,' 'The Rose-Bearer,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' 'Elektra,' and 'The Meistersingers.' On the third and sixth nights the Lyceum Theatre was crowded in all parts, and at most of the other performances the audience was large and, considering the advanced prices, better than might have been expected.

The performances were on the scale of completeness of ensemble on which Mr. Denhof has always insisted. With regard to the orchestra this was especially the case. In size and personnel the orchestra was completely satisfying, and their playing, despite much excellent work by the principals of the company, stood out as the artistic feature of the week.

A striking individual success was won by Mr. Frank Mullings, a new-comer to the operatic stage, in the part of Tristan. The beauty of his voice, his command of passion, and the surprising ease and resource of his acting made his performance one of arresting power and depth. Miss Gleeson-White's Isolde was also distinguished for its vivid, yet not over-stated intensity. In 'The Rose-Bearer,' Miss Agnes Nicholls sang exquisitely the music of the Princess. Other notable performances were those of Mr. Arthur Pacyna as Baron Ochs, in the Strauss comic opera, and Mr. Charles Knowles in 'The Flying Dutchman.' Strauss's 'The Rose-bearer' was a production of singularly high excellence. In 'The Meistersingers' the chorus was augmented by a large contingent from the Sheffield Opera Society, trained by Mr. Duffell.

At the first of the fifth series of Promenade Concerts, given in the Albert Hall, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony was the most important work performed. There have been so few performances of the Symphony in the city that its inclusion in the season's programme proved welcome. The orchestra, augmented in both wind and strings sections, played with sympathy and lucidity, and achieved their finest performance since their establishment. The overtures to 'Hänsel und Gretel' and 'Der Freischütz' were also included, and Mr. Percy Grainger's fascinating folk-song arrangement of 'Molly on the Shore' was smartly executed and enthusiastically received. Miss Auriol Jones played Saint-Saëns's 'Africa' Fantasia, and Mrs. Jessie Brett-Young gave songs by Bantock and Adolph Marx. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted.

Mr. Alfred Barker has been appointed conductor of the Sheffield Amateur Instrumental Society in succession to Mr. Frederick Dawson, and Mr. T. W. Hanforth similarly succeeds Mr. J. H. Parkes as conductor of the Sheffield Philharmonic Orchestra.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

Leeds has had during the past month almost more music than it can well digest. The Festival (October 1-4) was closely followed by a week's visit of the Denhof Opera Company, October 20-25, and though probably each undertaking suffered some pecuniary loss, since many who could not afford both were driven to make their choice, it is remarkable how much enthusiasm was called forth by both events. There is no need to refer to the Festival in this place, save to record that the general impression is one of satisfaction, and it is felt that the new departures have been more than justified by the result. The threatened collapse of the Denhof tour at Manchester,—and how Mr. Thomas Beecham came to the rescue,—have also been much discussed, and it is possible that the circumstances gave an additional fillip to his visit to Yorkshire, first at Sheffield and then at Leeds. His Leeds programme included the whole of the 'Ring,' with Gluck's 'Orpheus,' Mozart's 'Zauberflöte,' and Strauss's 'Rosenkavalier,'—a list which in quality and quantity exceeds anything that has been done at Leeds within the same time. The productions were characterized by Mr. Denhof's invariable thoroughness; his aim has always been not to consider how much he could dispense with, but how he could make his performances complete. Even the two harps required by Strauss were there, and though this falls short of the six demanded in the 'Ring,' it is more than provincial opera has ever known. Mr. Beecham and Mr. Schilling-Jiessens shared the office of conductor, and the latter gentleman made an excellent impression on this his first appearance in the English provinces.

With two such important events to fill people's minds and empty their pockets, it is not surprising that so far there is nothing to record of Leeds concerts, but the prospectuses which have been issued show no slackening in enterprise. The Leeds Philharmonic Concerts (which now include the old Subscription series) have arranged a series of five concerts, one being the usual Christmas 'Messiah.' Franck's 'Beatitudes,' and Wolf-Ferrari's 'La vita nuova,' both new to Leeds, are promised, and at the two orchestral concerts the Hallé Orchestra under Mr. Balling, and the New Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald, will appear, the programmes including Schumann's first Symphony, Beethoven's Fourth, Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' and short choral pieces by Bach, Beethoven (the 'Calm sea and prosperous voyage'), Cornelius, and Parry. The Leeds Choral Union promise three concerts, of which one is 'Messiah.' At the first concert an orchestra will be dispensed with, and Bantock's 'Atlantia in Calydon' will be repeated, with the assistance (as at last season's performance) of the Sheffield Musical Union. The third concert will introduce Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' again. The Leeds New Choral Society also intend to give the 'Messiah,' which we shall thus hear thrice within a week, in addition to 'Acis and Galatea'—a welcome revival—the Overture and Third Act of 'Tannhäuser,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' (Parts 1 and 3) and 'A tale of Old Japan.' The Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concerts, in continuation of the Municipal Concerts, are to be six in number, an increase of two over last season, and Mr. Fricker and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra will be heard in some excellent programmes of symphonies and other orchestral works, while among the soloists is Miss Fanny Davies, who will play Schumann's Pianoforte concerto at the first concert. A similar series of four 'Saturday Popular Concerts' is to be given by Mr. Julian Clifford and the Yorkshire Permanent Orchestra. Three are to be orchestral and one a ballad concert, but the programmes have not yet been made public. Among the best concerts at Leeds are those known as 'The Leeds Bohemian Chamber Concerts.' For the fifteenth season a series of four has been arranged, at which 'local artists will introduce recent works by Chausson, Akimenko, Tanéïev, Sibelius, and Glazounoff, as well as better known compositions by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and Dvorák.

BRADFORD.

At Bradford the season opened with the first of the Subscription Concerts on October 10, when Messrs. Thibaud, Casals, and Harold Bauer played Pianoforte trios by Brahms and Tchaikovsky. The series promises to be a very interesting one, including, among many other things, a performance under Mr. Balling of the Second and Third Acts of 'Parsifal,' Berlioz's 'Requiem,' Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra' and 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and Brahms's C minor Symphony. The Hallé Orchestra and the London Symphony Orchestra (under Herr Nikisch) will take part in these concerts. The Bradford Festival Choral Society gave 'St. Paul' on October 17, with Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Clara Baxandall, Messrs. Heather and Thorpe-Bates as soloists, and under the conductorship of Sir Frederic Cowen, who secured an excellent all-round performance. During the season the Society intend to give Elgar's 'The Music Makers,' Charles Wood's 'Dirge for two veterans,' and Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah,' as well as the customary 'Messiah.' The Bradford Old Choral Society are also giving the 'Messiah' and introducing to Bradford Bantock's 'The Fire Worshippers.' A portion of Haydn's 'Seasons,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha,' complete their programme. For their five concerts the Bradford Permanent Orchestra have enlisted the help of four different conductors, Mr. Fricker, Mr. Frederick Dawson, Mr. Julian Clifford, and Mr. Walter Haigh. Concertos by Saint-Saëns, Liszt, Beethoven, and Spohr form a feature of the programmes.

OTHER TOWNS.

Two of the Huddersfield Subscription Concerts have already taken place. At the first, on September 23, Mr. Johannes Wolff was the violinist, and Mr. David Clegg's ingenious performances on the organ, with which he associated a celesta played by a lady assistant, gave a popular note that seemed to be much appreciated by the audience. Four 'Songs of the Fair,' by Easthope Martin, were sung by Miss Alys Bateman. The second concert of the series, on October 14, was a Tetrassini night, the character of which needs no description. At the Huddersfield Philharmonic Concert, on October 11, the only feature calling for notice was Madame L. Parkin's praiseworthy performance of Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto in C minor. Mr. J. G. Ibeson conducted. On October 21 the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, under Mr. C. H. Moody, gave one of their concerts of unaccompanied choral music. The Wakefield and District Choral Society, a young and very enterprising body, gave, for the first time in this country, a new cantata by Max Bruch, 'The power of song,' on October 8. It is a setting of Schiller's poem for baritone soloist (Mr. Herbert Brown), chorus, and orchestra, and is in a serious and lofty vein worthy of its theme. It is needless to say that it is well written for both voices and orchestra, and gives a general impression of rich sonority. Mr. Percy H. Bligh conducted a very satisfactory performance, and with a few more male voices his choir would be an excellent one. Harrogate, with its interesting Symphony Concerts on Wednesday afternoons, has enjoyed more good music in the summer months than any other Yorkshire town, and Mr. Julian Clifford and the Municipal Orchestra have reason to be proud of the record of the season, which includes a long array of symphonies and concertos, many of them works which are not frequently heard. The twenty-eighth and last (save one, a popular 'extra') of these weekly concerts, was on October 8, when the programme included Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, which was admirably played, the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, with Mr. John Lawson, the leader of the Orchestra, as soloist, Wagner's 'Faust' Overture and the Angel's Scene from 'Hänsel und Gretel,'—a typical programme. On October 10 Mr. Clifford's benefit concert took place, and he secured the co-operation of Sir Frederic Cowen, who conducted his 'Phantasy of Life and Love,' and Concertstück, Mr. Clifford playing the solo part of the latter work in brilliant style. On October 14 Mischa Elman visited Harrogate, and played in masterly fashion Max Bruch's second Violin concerto, in D minor, a work of great power and beauty which is unjustly neglected. He was well accompanied by the Municipal Orchestra.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BRIGHTON.—At a meeting of the Sacred Harmonic Society on September 29 Mr. Robert Taylor, who has conducted the Society for nearly half its eighty-six years of existence, was re-elected and the following programme for the season was adopted:—'The Messiah' (Good Friday), 'Acis and Galatea,' Sullivan's 'The Prodigal Son' and Dr. Parry's 'Judas.' Allusion was made to the weakening of the Society's position owing to the institution of the Municipal Choir.—At the annual general meeting of the Brighton Musical Fraternity, an organization now in its thirtieth year, Mr. Robert Taylor was elected to the vacant position of president.—Considerable success attended the appearance of Misses Una and Irene Truman, pianists, at the Dome on October 1. Accompanied by the Municipal Orchestra under Mr. Lyell-Taylor they gave an excellent performance of Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes. Beethoven's fifth Symphony was also in the programme.

CAMBRIDGE.—The University Musical Society have announced a series of Chamber Concerts at the Guildhall (large room), of which the chief features are as follows:—October 29, the Rosé Quartet; November 12, Mr. Harry Bedford and Mr. Egon Petri; December 3, Miss Elena Gerhardt; January 21, the London String Quartet; February 4, Chamber music with wind instruments; March 4, the Brussels String Quartet.

CARDIFF.—A great improvement has been made in the music department of the University College. The teaching facilities of this institution have recently been extended. Scholarships to the value of £155 are awarded. The University Choral and Orchestral Societies have weekly rehearsals under the conductorship of Prof. David Evans, and terminal concerts are given by students.—The visit of the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company to the New Theatre was very successful, and the excellent performances of 'The Mikado,' 'H.M.S. Pinafore,' 'Trial by jury,' 'Yeomen of the Guard,' &c., gained special appreciation.—Gwent Male Glee Singers sang at the Cory Hall, after a triumphal tour in America.

HANLEY.—The Potteries Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Carl Oliver, opened their fourth season on October 9, with a successful concert at which Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was the chief feature of the programme. There was also a selection of part-songs, including Frank Idle's 'Puck is King,' and Montague Phillips's 'Evensong' and 'Morning song.' The choral singing was of all-round merit, and contributed to the reputation of the choir. Mr. Alfred Hollins added to the high attraction of the concert by his admirable work at the organ, and the other soloists were Miss Gertie Perry and Mr. John Collett (vocalists), and Mr. W. T. Bonner (pianist).—On October 16, the first concert of the famous North Staffordshire District Choral Society took place, under the direction of Mr. H. G. Woodall. The choral programme, which consisted of Wilbye's 'Ye that do live in pleasures plenty' and 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Bantock's 'The nightingale is silent' and 'Spirit of Night,' Protheroe's 'The Crusaders,' and 'Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' was carried out with all the choir's exceptional technique and resource of expression. The soloists of the occasion were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Robert Radford, and Mr. T. Henry Smith (violinist).

MILFORD-ON-SEA.—Schubert's Mass in G, and Stanford's 'The battle of the Baltic' form the season's programme of the Choral Society, of which Mr. Abdy Williams is conductor.

OBAN.—Two concerts are to be given by the Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. H. J. Pattison, this winter, the first in the week preceding Christmas. The repertoire for that week will include solos (by members of the Society), choruses from the 'Messiah,' 'The sea hath its pearls' (Pinsuti), and 'The miller's wooing' (Eaton Fanning). For the second concert, which will be given in March at the close of the session, the principal works will be 'Hymn of Praise' (Mendelssohn), and 'The Revenge' (Stanford). The string quintet from the Scottish Orchestra, which met with so much appreciation last spring, will again be engaged for this occasion, as well as professional vocalists.

OLDHAM.—The works chosen by the Musical Society for the season are Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon Suite,' 'The Messiah,' and Elgar's 'King Olaf.' The conductor is Mr. H. Brookes.

PLUMSTEAD.—At the annual general meeting of the Lyric, Glee and Orchestral Society, Mr. H. F. Driver gave an eloquent address upon Art, and musical art in particular. Mr. F. Gauron was elected conductor of the Society.

JOHANNESBURG.—The Wanderers' (large) Hall was well filled by a highly appreciative audience on August 21, when the Johannesburg Philharmonic Society gave their thirteenth concert. The works performed were Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' under the direction of Mr. L. R. Glenton. The soloists were Miss Blodwen Hopkins, Miss Ethel Mann, Mr. Denbigh Edwards, and Mr. Robert Hunter, and the orchestra was led by Miss Milly Wildner. The efficient work done by this Society speaks highly for the ability and enterprise of the conductor, Mr. L. R. Glenton.—The 134th meeting of the Orchestral Society took place at Caledonian Hall on September 10, when an interesting programme was carried out under the direction of Mr. F. W. Peters. Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture and Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, given with Mr. R. B. Lloyd as soloist, were the principal numbers. The other soloists of the occasion were Miss E. de Wet and Mr. G. F. Hooson (vocalists).

KINGSTON (JAMAICA).—A Coleridge-Taylor Festival was held with considerable success on September 16 and 17, under the patronage of the Governor of Jamaica and the Mayor of Kingston. Two concerts were given, at each of which 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' was performed, under the direction of Mr. George D. Goode, by a choir and orchestra of 130. The tenor soloist was Dr. G. F. Gill. Mrs. G. D. Goode, Miss Sylvia Sowley, Mr. Henry Nation, Dr. Gill, and the Kingston Glee Singers assisted in the miscellaneous numbers of the two programmes, which were entirely chosen from the works of Coleridge-Taylor.

Foreign Notes.

AACHEN.

The new choral work 'Les Fioretti de François d'Assise,' by Gabriel Piérne, 'Lebenstanz,' by F. Delius, a Symphony in D by Donald F. Tovey, Debussy's 'Printemps,' Reger's 'Ballet suite,' 'Symphonischer prolog,' and five Motets for mixed voices a cappella, Korngold's 'Sinfonietta,' Dvorák's 'Heldenlied,' Somervell's 'Konzertstück' for violin, and Strauss's 'Festliches Präludium' are among the works which Musikdirektor Fritz Busch has selected for first performances during this season.

ANTWERP.

Among the new works to be performed for the first time at the Théâtre Royal, are: 'Vercingetorix,' by Felix Fourdrain, 'La Gioconda,' by Ponchielli, 'L'Heure fleur,' by Stienon du Pré, and Puccini's 'La Fille du Far West.'—At the Opéra Flamand, Emile Wambach's 'Quinten Massys' has been successfully revived. 'Heibieke,' a two-act opera by Ed. Verheyden (libretto by R. Verhulst) was given for the first time.

BADEN-BADEN.

August Scharrer's 'Overture zu einem ritterlichen Spiel,' Op. 26, will be produced during this month at the Symphony Concerts, under the direction of Kapellmeister Paul Hein.

BASEL.

The programme of the Allgemeine Musikgesellschaft include the following: 'Balletsuite' (Max Reger); 'Kriegsbilder,' Suite (Köttscher); Violin concerto (Weissmann); 'Das Lied von der Erde' (Mahler); 'Lebenstanz' (F. Delius), and 'Blanik' (Smetana). These works will be heard here for the first time under the conductorship of Hermann Suter.

BAYREUTH.

The Wagner Festival performances will be resumed next year. They commence on July 22 with 'The Flying Dutchman,' which will also be given on July 31, August 5, 11, and 19. 'Parsifal' is to be played on July 23, and on August 1, 4, 7, 8, 10, and 20. Two cycles of 'The Ring' are planned, the first for July 25, 26, 27, and 29, the second for August 13, 14, 15, and 17.—A sensational burglary has been committed at the Villa Wahnfried. Several valuable curiosities were stolen, among them a silver snuff-box used by Richard Wagner, and the composer's diamond-studded watch. The documents and manuscripts, which are kept in a metal box, were untouched.

BERLIN.

Under the direction of Herr Robert Laugs (recently appointed Kapellmeister at the Opera), Auber's 'Fra Diavolo' has been revived with marked success.—In commemoration of Verdi's centenary the Royal Opera propose to give a cycle of his operas. These performances will be distributed over the whole of the coming season.—At the Lessing Theater, Ibsen's drama, 'Peer Gynt,' with Grieg's music, was revived and very much appreciated. The Blüthner-Orchester performed the instrumental part.—The 'Mémoires' of Lilli Lehmann, the celebrated concert singer, have just been published under the title of 'Mein Weg' (My path of life).—The English tenor, Mr. Whitney Mockridge, was heard in a concert recently given at the Klindworth-Scharwenkasaal and was very cordially received.—A class for cembalo, under the direction of Madame Wanda Landowska, the famous cembalist, has been added to the Royal Akademische High School for Music. Fräulein Renschel and Herr Fischer (of the same School) have been appointed professors of the Jaques-Dalcroze Methode.—At the Festconcert given on September 21 by the Berliner-Tonkünstlerverein, a hitherto unknown Symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia (1712-86) was produced. At the same concert, J. S. Bach's stupendous work 'Das musikalische Opfer,' was given for the first time in its entirety, and a very interesting Octet for pianoforte, clarinet, two horns, two violas, 'cello and double-bass, by Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia (who was killed in the battle of Saalfeld, 1806), was also heard and very favourably received.—An interesting organ recital was recently given at the Schöneberger Paul Gerhard Kirche, by the well-known organist, Arthur Egidi. The programme included Max Reger's 'Variations and fugue on an original theme' (Op. 73), and his 'Fantasia and Fugue on B-A-C-H.'—The chief works chosen for the Schubert-Brahms evening given on October 18 by the Königliche Hof- und Domchor were Schubert's 'Stabat Mater' in F minor, and Brahms's 'German Requiem.'—Signor Puccini will be present at the first performance of his 'Manon Lescaut' at the Deutsche Opernhaus.—'Heiderosein,' the new operetta by Kalmann (libretto by Franz Martes and Rudolf Schanger), will be produced here during the season.—A 'Deutsche Motette,' for mixed chorus (sixteen voices and four solo-voices), by Richard Strauss, will be produced on November 12, under the direction of M. Rudel. The work is dedicated to Prof. Hugo Rudel and the Royal Opera-choir, Berlin.—Dr. Camille Saint-Saëns has had a splendid reception. The concert given in his honour by the Philharmonic was a triumph. He conducted his Symphony in A minor (Op. 55), his 'Danse Macabre' (Op. 40), and was also heard in the solo part of his Fantasia 'Africa' and his 'Wedding-cake.' Dr. Saint-Saëns was also present at the hundredth performance of his chef d'œuvre, 'Samson et Dalila,' at the Royal Opera. The 101st performance was announced to take place on October 14, under the composer's direction.—'Potiphar' (or 'Potiphar's wife') is the title of the latest work (a ballet or pantomime) by Richard Strauss. M. Nijinsky is said to have been selected to play the part of Joseph.

CHICAGO.

The Apollo Musical Club, of which Mr. Harrison M. Wild is conductor, have chosen the following works for their season's programme: 'The Creation,' 'Elijah,' 'The Messiah,' Elgar's 'The Music Makers,' Dvořák's 'Stabat Mater,' and Bach's Mass in B minor.

COLOGNE.

Among the works to be produced at the famous Gürzenich-Concerts, under the direction of Herr Steinbach, are 'Kuckucksruf im Frühling' and 'Sommerabend am Flusse,' two small tone-poems by F. Delius; and Heinrich Zöllner's third Symphony. This Symphony will also be heard at Berlin, Hamburg, Leipsic; and at Bremen, Dresden, Zürich, and Vienna. The full score of the work has just been published.—An Oratorien-Chor has been formed in this city, under the direction of Herr Hrdlicka.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

The scheme of founding a Conservatorium for dramatic art seems to have survived the recent political disturbance. The municipal council has the matter in hand, and a subsidy of 125,000 francs is asked for.

DRESDEN.

Wolf-Ferrari's new opera, 'L'Amour Médecin' (after Molière), was announced to be produced last month under the direction of Herr E. Schuch.

EISENACH.

The most interesting feature of the chamber-music concerts given at the second small Bach Festival was undoubtedly the performance of Antonio Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for four violins, followed by Bach's Concerto in A minor for four pianofortes, the Bach Concerto being an arrangement of the Vivaldi Concerto. Two Motets for five voices, 'Der Gerechte, ob er gleich stirbt,' by John Christian Bach, and a 'Mirabile mysterium,' by Gallus, sung by the Duisburger a cappella Chorus, were much appreciated.

GENEVA.

M. H. Kling, the distinguished composer and professor at the Conservatoire, gives, in the Tribune de Genève, some very interesting details as to the books Mozart always took with him on his travels. The most important were a Cologne edition of the Holy Bible (in Latin), dating from 1679; the celebrated dialogue 'Phädon,' by Mendelssohn (grandfather of Felix); 'The training of the reason,' by Joh. Arnold Ebert; 'The history of Germany,' by Masov; two volumes of the life of Joseph II. (son of Maria Theresa); various works by Frederick the Great, Molière, Metastasio; and also several volumes of Cramer's Music-Magazine.

HELSINGFORS.

Sir Edward Elgar's new Symphonic-study, 'Falstaff,' will be performed on November 24 at the sixth concert of the Symphonic Orchestra, under the baton of Herr Georg Schneevoigt.

LEIPSIK.

'Die Marketenderin' (The canteen woman) is the title of Humperdinck's new opera.—The first performance of Humperdinck's music to 'The Miracle' took place on September 9, at the Albert Halle.

LYONS.

The 1913-14 season promises to be exceptionally interesting. Among the works to be given their first performances here, under M. Gaston Bleyle's direction, are Wagner's 'Parsifal,' Strauss's 'Salome,' Ravel's 'Ma mère l'Oye,' Dukas's 'La Peri,' Florent Schmidt's 'Le tragédie de Salomé,' D'Indy's 'Istar,' and Mozart's 'Les petits riens.'

MADRID.

There has recently been inaugurated a monument to the memory of four of the propagators of the most popular kind of Zarzuelas (Operettas)—two poets, Ramon de la Cruz and Ricardo de la Vega, and two composers, Francisco Barbiera and Chucca.—Hans Pfitzner has been invited by the directors of the Royal Theatre to conduct the first performance of 'Parsifal' in Spanish.

MARSEILLES.

The novelties to be given during the forthcoming season at the Opéra include: 'Icare' (Berlandier); 'Le Dépit amoureux' (Gerard); 'L'Eau enchantée' (E. Mathé); 'Les Fantômes' (Lalove). Among the works to be performed for the first time here are 'Sadko' (Rimsky-Korsakoff) and 'Parsifal' (Wagner).

MILAN.

Mascagni's new opera, 'Parisina' (libretto by D'Annunzio) will be produced under the direction of the composer at La Scala on the 18th of the current month. 'L'Abime' by Sinagaglia, 'L'Ombre de Don Juan,' by Frank Alfano, and 'Parsifal,' are all announced.—M. Puccini has nearly finished three one-act operas in various styles to libretti by Didier Gold, D'Annunzio and Tristan Bernard.—Under the shadow of the Verdi centenary, that of Arcangelo Corelli, the real founder of the High School of Violin so famous in the 18th century, is being celebrated. The small town of Fusignano, where Corelli was born in 1653 (he died at Rome in 1753), is preparing a commemorative concert, which will be conducted by Signor Amilcare Zanella. We hear that, at the same time, a book on Corelli by famous Italian and foreign writers will be published.

PALERMO.

The composer of 'Adrienne Lecouvreur,' Signor Francisco Cilea, has been appointed director of the Conservatoire. The committee consisted of Arrigo Boito, Umberto Giordano, E. Bossi, Galignani, and Bolzoni.

PARMA.

The Verdi performance opened with the composer's first extant opera, 'Oberto Conte di San Bonifacio' (his first opera, 'Rocester,' having been lost).

PRAGUE.

A hitherto unknown and unpublished choral work for male voices and baritone solo with pianoforte accompaniment, 'Die Falschmünzer' (The Coiners), by Conradin Kreutzer, has been discovered and is at present in the possession of M. Edwin Janetschek, the well-known musical scientist.

RIO DE JANEIRO.

'Parsifal' has been given here for the first time by the members of the Constanzi-Theatre, from Rome.

ROUEN.

Three new works by Jean Nougues—the ballet 'Narkiss,' the opera 'Le Dante,' and 'La Danseuse de Pompei,'—are on the programme of the Théâtre des Arts. Other promising novelties are to be given.

SALZBURG.

In connection with the inauguration of the 'Mozarteum' in August, 1914, a great Mozart Festival will take place from August 12 to August 20. Several master's immortal 'Don Juan,' 'Le Seraglio,' and several symphony concerts will be given.

SONDERSHAUSEN.

At the seventeenth Loh-Konzert, given by the court orchestra under the conductorship of Prof. Corbach, two new orchestral works were produced—an Overture in B minor, by the young Swedish composer, Oskar Lindberg, of Stockholm; and a Symphonic-poem, 'Abschieds'szene,' by the well-known professor of theory, Ferdinand Braunroth, who died recently at Dresden. Both works proved very successful.

STRASBURG.

The new three-act opera, 'Palestrina,' text and music by Hans Pfitzner, will be published by a German firm in Paris, so that benefit may be derived from the fifty years' protection after the death of the author. (Strauss proceeded in the same way with his 'Der Rosenkavalier'.)

VIENNA.

Dr. Hans Richter has definitely refused to conduct the first performance of 'Parsifal.'—The celebrated conductor of the Wiener Konzertverein, Ferdinand Lowe, will shortly produce a hitherto unknown Symphony by Anton Bruckner. The full score has been in the possession of M. Hynais, one of Bruckner's pupils. It is stated that this Symphony is the first of the composer's orchestral works.—Elgar's new Symphonic-study 'Falstaff' will be performed by the same Society on December 10.—On January 5, 1914, a performance of Elgar's Violin concerto will be given under the direction of Herr F. Schalk, with Dr. Adolph Brodsky as soloist.

WIESBADEN.

Miss Adelaide Parker, the organist, appeared with success at the Kurhaus recently, the occasion being an 'Organ-matinée.'

ZURICH.

A very interesting concert, devoted entirely to works of Saint-Saëns, was given on October 2 by the brothers Kellert, from Paris—Michael (pianoforte), Raphael (violin), and Gabriel (violoncello).

Miscellaneous.

The Société des Concerts Français announce four concerts, with programmes of high interest and artists of the front rank. On November 13, Madame Jane Pathori and M. Henri Etlin will take part in music by Debussy and Ravel. On January 16, M. Roger Ducasse will assist in the performance of his Pianoforte quartet, and accompany Madame—Durand-Texte in a group of his songs. On February 16, the Parisian Quartet will play Ravel's well-known work in F major, and join Madame Feuillard in Gabriel Dupont's 'Poème' for pianoforte and strings; Mlle. Hélène Luquiens will be the singer. At the fourth concert, in May, M. Albert Roussel will conduct his 'Musique de scène,' for small orchestra, from 'Le marchand de sable qui passe'; songs will be given by Mlle. Balguerie, and Charles Bordes's 'Suite Basque' for flute and strings will be heard.

Under the auspices of the National Home-Reading Union a lecture on English Folk-Song was given by Dr. R. Vaughan Williams at the Central Buildings, Westminster, on October 3. The synopsis of the lecture was as follows:—The nature of Traditional Art—Un-selfconscious as opposed to Selfconscious Music—The power and strength of Tradition —'A Folk-Song composes itself': the literal truth of this proposition—Traditional Art is of necessity 'communal'—English Folk-Song a comparatively recent field of study: reasons for this—Examples of (a) individual variations on a common theme; (b) common phrases in different melodies—The comparative vitality of Ballad Music compared with the decay of Ballad Literature—The value of English Folk-Song to English people—Nationalism in Art. Illustrations were supplied by Mr. J. Campbell McInnes.

Excellent work is being done by the L.C.C. Hackney Institute Musical Society, of which Mr. Percy R. Kirk is president, and Miss E. Bishop, Hackney Institute, Dalston Lane, is hon. secretary. The report of the 1912-13 season summarizes an interesting series of lectures given before the Society by musicians of eminence, and with it is issued a prospectus for the present season, announcing the following engagements: Mr. Percy Scholes, to lecture on 'Wagner and the story of "The Ring"'; Dr. Markham Lee, on 'Johannes Brahms'; Mr. Ernest Fowles, on 'Great composers of the nineteenth century'; Mr. H. Plunket Greene, on 'Interpretation in song'; Sir Frederick Bridge, on 'Pepys's Diary, and its musical notes'; Mr. Hermann Klein, on 'The art of singing'; Mr. C. Egerton Lowe, on 'Mozart.'

The following awards have been made at the Royal Academy of Music: The Ada Lewis Scholarships to Gladys M. Rolfe (pianoforte), Margaret Tennant Cochrane (violin), Dorothy Grace Godwin (harp); the Macfaren Scholarship (composition) to Leo Livens; the Sir Michael Costa Scholarship (composition) to Arthur L. Sandford; the Goring Thomas Scholarships (composition) to Eric Grant and Morfydd Owen; the Thomas Threlfall Scholarship (organ) to Ernest P. Rudling; the Sainton-Dolby Scholarship (soprano) to Dorothy S. Poppleton; the Stainer Exhibition (organ) to Frank M. Cram; the Ross Scholarship (singing) to Stella Esdaile.

The twenty-fifth yearly meeting of the Nonconformist Choir Union was held at the offices of the Sunday School Union, Old Bailey, E.C., on October 7, and was very largely attended. Mr. E. Minshall, the president of the Union since its formation a quarter of a century ago, occupied the chair. Mr. Arthur Berridge, the secretary, presented the report, which showed very satisfactory progress in all departments of the Union's activities. The result of the ballot for the new executive was announced and a programme formulated for the next Festival.

The conductors of the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society are now Mr. Hamish MacCunn (orchestral), and Mr. Frank Idle (choral). At each of the three concerts arranged for the season, a new work will be produced: on December 1, a Suite, 'Gwenever,' by Mr. Vincent Thomas; on February 5, a Suite, 'From Diarmid,' by Mr. MacCunn, and on April 2, Mr. MacCunn's Border Ballad for choir and orchestra, 'The death of Darcy Reed,' will be given for the first time.

The Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Michael Balling, visited London under the auspices of the National Sunday League, and gave concerts on October 19 at the Palladium (afternoon), and the London Opera House (evening). The first programme was entirely selected from Wagner's works; the second contained Beethoven's fifth Symphony and Strauss's 'Don Juan.'

The music chosen for practice by the Civil Service Orchestra, under Mr. Frye Parker, during the coming season includes Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, Sullivan's Overture 'Di Ballo,' Beethoven's 'Fidelio' Overture, Sibelius's 'Finlandia,' Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody,' and German's 'Welsh Rhapsody.' The hon. deputy-conductor and secretary is Mr. J. Stansfeld.

Mr. Douglas Lane Evans has won the organ scholarship recently thrown open to competition at King's College, Cambridge. He received his early training as a chorister under Mr. Eyre at St. John's Church, Upper Norwood. His scholastic training was received from Mr. J. D. Davies, of Thornton Heath School, and was continued at St. Paul's School, West Kensington.

Mr. John Francis Barnett's new cantata, 'The Eve of St. Agnes,' which is to be produced by the London Choral Society on December 3, marks a new departure on the part of the composer, as it is continuous music (not being divided into numbers, as was 'The Ancient Mariner'), and Leitmotiven are used. The work is laid out for four soloists, chorus, and a large orchestra.

For the present season Ferryhill and District Choral Society will study Smart's 'Bride of Dunkerron' and Stanford's 'The Revenge' and 'Phaudrig Crohoore.' The Spennymoor (Mount Pleasant) Wesleyan Choir, for their sixteenth Annual Choir Sunday performance on November 30, are preparing 'St. Paul.' Mr. T. Shields conducts both Societies.

In our notice of the British Music Exhibition at Olympia we omitted to record the exhibit of Allison Pianos, Ltd. This well-known firm showed excellent instruments of various types, amongst which their 'Grandette' may be especially mentioned. It is one of the best 'baby' grands on the market, and a credit to British manufacture and design.

An interesting ceremony took place at Girvan, South Ayrshire, recently. A monument was dedicated to the memory of William Jackson, a composer widely known in his day, who died at Girvan about forty years ago. His most successful compositions were the songs 'Bonnie lass o' Ballochmyle' and 'Dear little Shamrock.'

Mr. C. J. Bishenden has arranged to give a further series of lecture-concerts during the 1913-14 season, at 105, New Oxford Street. His subject on October 13 was 'J. L. Hatton and singers of his time.'

The works chosen for performance by the Worcester Musical Society (Mr. W. Mann Dyson) this season are Sterndale Bennett's 'The Woman of Samaria,' and Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols.'

The works that are being prepared by the Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society, of which Mr. Joseph Ivey is conductor, include Symphonies by Haydn (No. 5, in D), Mozart (No. 38, in D), and Brahms (No. 2, first movement).

The Sheffield Choral Union, of which Lieut. S. Suckley is conductor, have chosen Hofmann's 'Cinderella,' 'The Messiah,' and 'The Seasons,' for performance during the season.

A lecture on 'Acoustics and the musician' was given by Dr. Churchill Sibley, at 18, Berners Street, W., on October 16, under the auspices of the Incorporated Guild of Musicians.

Mr. E. Sims-Hilditch has been appointed music-master at the Cheshire County Training College, Crewe.

Answers to Correspondents.

G. R. OSWELL.—The question of the form of vowel singers should employ in the word 'wind' is a perennial one. Usage is now establishing the ordinary spoken pronunciation, although it must be confessed this is sometimes inconvenient. There is therefore no rule in the matter.

X. Y. Z.—Typewriting may develop certain muscles at the expense of others in a way that antagonizes with the proper development of an organist's or pianist's hand. It is a dubious point. We have not heard of any scientific investigation into the matter.

ANXIOUS.—Whether a girl in her teens should practise singing depends upon the state of her voice. If it shows signs of breathiness it would be advisable to let her voice rest.

J. L. D.—'Elijah' is Op. 70. Mendelssohn reached Op. 121. From Op. 73 to Op. 121 are posthumous works.

ORGANUM.—Your pseudonym has several meanings. See Grove's Dictionary.

CHESTER'S CIRCULATING MUSIC LIBRARY, BRIGHTON.

5, Cathcart Road,
South Kensington, S.W.,
July 25th, 1903.

Dear Mr. Chester,

I hear that it is your intention further to develop the business in connection with your Circulating Music Library.

In wishing you every success in that undertaking, it gives me much pleasure to say how complete and admirable upon all occasions I have found your Library, as well as your stock of music. Indeed your business has always seemed to me to lack nothing that any musician or student could possibly require.

Believe me, yours faithfully,
(Signed) W. KUHE.

5, Clifton Road, Brighton,
September 8, 1903.

Dear Mr. Chester,

In returning the Music you were kind enough to send me on selection, I cannot help saying a few words about your Music Library, and being the doyen of the Musical profession in Brighton, I hope it will not be arrogant in me, if I speak as the representative of the profession.

My experience is mostly with Music for String Instruments and for the Orchestra; and in that direction your Lending Library has done great things for us. It has enabled Conductors to attempt works, and the public to enjoy them, which it would have been very difficult and very expensive to procure without your help. The completeness of the Library is quite astonishing, and whether we wanted a Haydn Symphony or a Tchaikowsky, a Mozart or a Brahms, they were equally at our disposal, and so it was with Chamber Music.

I can only hope that you have been repaid for the labour and thought you must have given to this matter, and that it has been as profitable to you as it has been beneficial to us professors and the public.—Yours very truly, (Signed) LEOP. STERN.

17, Cathcart Road,
South Kensington, S.W., June 15, 1904.

Dear Mr. Chester,

I should like to be allowed to express my admiration of the skill, tact, knowledge, and promptitude which have enabled you to make so great a success of your Circulating Music Library. Your enterprise in always securing the latest important compositions published abroad, as well as at home, is so remarkable that my friends and I are accustomed to speak of Brighton as the most likely part of London and its suburbs in which to obtain anything in the way of music that is more than usually new or uncommon.

In the hope that your valuable services may long continue available to the musical public,

I am, dear Mr. Chester,
Very faithfully your

Dear Mr. Chester,

I should like to express, as far as I can, my appreciation of the benefit I have for many years derived from your wonderful knowledge of musical literature, and your splendid stock of English and foreign publications. When I have wanted a piece, however out of the way, old or of the newest, you can always tell me its publisher: and you have a copy in stock practically always. Such a library as yours is of the highest advantage to a teacher, and also to a student. What I have learnt concerning musical literature is founded entirely on the contents of your musical library.

Messrs. J. & W. Chester.
Gentlemen,

I herewith return last selection, and have to thank you as always for the great pleasure your selections give me.

Being so far away from a music centre makes me appreciate all the more your good offices in this matter. Awaiting your next favour,

I am, yours truly,
(Signed) (Dr.) JOHN BROOM.

74, Hova Villas, Hove, Sussex,
April 30, 1904.

Dear Mr. Chester,

If the testimony of an obscure amateur is of any use, I am very glad indeed to assure anyone who reads this, that for completeness, advantages, and low subscription, no other musical lending library I know can compare with yours; and I have tried some of the best in London, Vienna, Berlin, Paris, Moscow, and other great musical centres. No matter what music I want, and I have generally required the newest, foreign, and least-known works, you hand it me at once from your wonderful store, or procure it for me with a promptness that I have never experienced elsewhere.

Yours faithfully,
ERNEST E. CHANT.

London, Sept. 15, 1904.

Dear Mr. Chester,

Since you deem my testimony of value, it gives me great pleasure to bear witness to the remarkable comprehensiveness of your stock of music.

Your ability to supply me at once with the latest compositions, Continental as well as British, has often surprised me, and on several occasions been of great service, when away from home.

Yours truly,
(Signed) F. GILBERT WEBB.

Feb. 28, 1905.

Dear Mr. Chester,

I duly received the parcel, and am glad that you have at last triumphed over the sleepy publishers.

I take this opportunity of thanking you for the way in which you have, during the last 24 years, always succeeded in supplying me with admirable promptitude and usually from stock—with the most out-of-the-way compositions by all sorts of foreign composers. It would have been a shame if these people had broken down your record!

That you may long be spared to prosecute your business successfully is the hearty wish of

Yours very faithfully,
(Signed) F. CORDER.

Extract from letter received from the late Dr. F. J. Sawyer, F.R.C.O. :—

"My London friends envy me, because, thanks to your enterprise, I know all the newest music long before they do . . . with your extraordinary stock and your complete lending library, Brighton musicians ought to be the best read in the country. Let me then discharge some of the great debt of 'musical gratitude' that I owe you."

1, Norfolk Crescent,
Hyde Park, W., March 27, 1905.

My dear Mr. Chester,

I must write and compliment you upon your admirable and wonderfully comprehensive Musical Library, which seems quite unique and is kept thoroughly up to date.

All the most recent publications are there—English, French, German, Russian, Italian.

The music lover who resides at Brighton has certainly reason to be grateful to you for providing him with such excellent musical fare.

As one who has partaken of this fare, I have much pleasure in expressing to you the delight I have experienced.

Believe me,
Yours sincerely,
(Signed) ARTHUR HERVEY.

FALSTAFF

SYMPHONIC-STUDY

IN C MINOR, WITH TWO INTERLUDES IN A MINOR
FOR FULL ORCHESTRA.

BY EDWARD ELGAR

OP. 68.

MINIATURE SCORE,
PAPER, 7s. 6d.; CLOTH, 10s. 6d.

FULL SCORE AND ORCHESTRAL PARTS ON HIRE.

THE TIMES.

We get again the Elgar of the brilliant "Cockaigne" Overture, of the "Pomp and Circumstance" and "Coronation" Marches. There is an abundance of highly original orchestration, and the whole is moulded with a stronger hand than these earlier and smaller works.

THE TELEGRAPH.

It is certainly the most elaborate of Elgar's works so far. . . . It is on every page the hand and the voice of Elgar, who speaks with no uncertainty: in a vein of quaint humour, as when Falstaff sleeps; of rare beauty and charm, as in the interludes; and even more in the exquisite closing scene of the fall and death of Falstaff. . . . Elgar has given us a masterpiece of music, prodigiously stamped with his own remarkable personality.

THE MORNING POST.

Sir Edward Elgar's music is a remarkable example of his powers presented in a light highly unusual. He frankly enters the field of programme music and does so with immediate success. . . . As a musical illustration of a Shakespeare character it is one of the most remarkable scores produced. . . . Apart from its fidelity to the particular aspect of Falstaff offered by the play it has great value as music, and that value is found in the fact that the composer reveals an expansion of style and a great quality of beauty and charm. . . . The work, very finely played under the composer's guidance, marks an advance in Sir Edward Elgar's art, and constitutes a valuable addition to Shakespeare music whose worth cannot fail to be recognised.

THE DAILY GRAPHIC.

The design of his Symphonic Study is masterly in its breadth and decision, and no elaboration of detail is permitted to obscure the main outline of the structure. It falls into four main divisions, broken by two interludes, which, while still forming a material part of the development, come as a welcome relief to what might otherwise prove too breathless, a rush of incident. . . . The opening section is a lax miracle of life and gaiety. We are in the midst of a wit combat of bewildering dexterity. The themes fly backward and forward like tennis balls across a net. So rapid is the repartee that one positively gasps for breath. . . . At the right moment comes the first interlude, in which the Knight is wafted dreams back to boyhood and sees himself once more a slim page. The delicate charm of this passage demands description. . . . It must be said that Elgar has written a masterpiece which does equal honour to himself and to the land that bred him.

THE DAILY MAIL.

It is the work of a man arrived at consummate mastery of his means, who has contrived a speech that exactly expresses him. The new "Falstaff" has an animation in its succession of scenes of tavern revelry, highway robbery and warfare, broken only by the two little interludes gracefully hinting at old dance movements, that cannot surely for long fail to exhilarate all hearers.

THE DAILY NEWS.

"Falstaff" shows us Elgar in a new light. Though his personality is still unmistakable, he has got nearer than ever before to the school of which Strauss is the chief representative. The themes are expressive and richly humorous and pathetic. . . . The whole work is full of wonderfully rich and novel orchestration and happy touches of musical psychology, and it is finely proportioned.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

The chief theme, in spite of its ponderous accents, is a little featureless, but another phrase representing the boasting side of his [Falstaff's] character is a capital one, of real humour, and cleverly treated by the composer. But the purely pictorial element is of rather stronger calibre than the psychology, and in the next section, where the revelries of Falstaff over with merriment, the orchestration having many deft touches of humour. . . . The orchestration of "Falstaff" deserves more than a word or two. Elgar has always had a wonderful command of instrumentation, especially in tone-colour, but in this latest work he has surpassed himself. Every instrument has a virtuoso part, and the brilliance and mastery of the writing, its amazing richness and variety in colour and effect, are remarkable.

EVENING NEWS.

"Falstaff" is a work of the utmost charm and interest and a notable achievement on the part of the composer. In one respect, its instrumentation, it is still more remarkable, for the orchestra is handled with a brilliance and mastery which few composers could equal.

THE MYSTIC TRUMPETER

POEM

BY

WALT WHITMAN.

SET TO MUSIC

FOR BARITONE SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

HAMILTON HARTY.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

TONIC SOL-FA (in the Press)

THE TIMES.

Mr. Harty's cantata, "The Mystic Trumpeter," has a directness which engages one's sympathy at once. The composer shows considerable skill in the management of simple effect, and behind the effect there is sincere feeling.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Harty's setting may find an honoured place in the repertory of many a provincial choral society. . . . It is in no wise difficult, considering the present state of choral technique, and the choruses are effective alike for singer and hearer. . . . He gives us moments of striking beauty, and often rises to a height of real poetry.

THE MORNING POST.

Mr. Hamilton Harty has treated his theme with much freshness and resource. He gives proof of his command of fancy and contrivance, yet he loses none of the charm that always distinguishes his music. The description of Paradise is of entrancing beauty, and the picture of the Crusaders lives in graphic tints. In dealing with the love section he is tender beyond imagination, and his climax of joy is spontaneous and unrestrained, giving the exact note the verse requires.

THE STANDARD.

Mr. Harty clothes all in harmonies that remove them from the commonplace. Never for a moment is he at a loss for an appropriate figure or phrase; indeed, it is his ready command of ways and means that is perhaps the most striking feature of the music. The work should find high favour with choral societies all over the kingdom.

THE DAILY MAIL.

"The Mystic Trumpeter" calls for a variety of picturesque illustrations, and this Mr. Hamilton Harty has supplied with the fulness of his facile and efficient talent. . . . The workmanship is extremely polished, and the composer seems always to hit the effect he is bent on.

THE DAILY NEWS.

The choral writing of "The Mystic Trumpeter" is such as Yorkshire loves, and the singers revelled in the broad phrases and strong harmonies. Mr. Harty's meaning is never in doubt. He has seized on the salient characteristics of each section with unerring instinct, and if he does not stop to consider the subtler shades of meaning, the poem is one which calls for broad treatment rather than ultra delicacy.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Harty has seized the musical possibilities of the text with great skill, and produced a series of inspiring mood-pictures with a refreshing youthfulness about them which is sure to make the work popular.

THE YORKSHIRE POST.

There is nothing tentative about Mr. Harty's score, every effect is assured, every passage sounds well. The appeal he makes is instantaneous, partly, no doubt, because the pictures presented by the poet are obvious enough to require no very great subtlety of treatment, but in a greater measure because of the transparent clearness of the effects. For this reason, and because of the genuine picturesque charm of the work, one is pretty certain that it will be taken up by not a few choral societies.

No. 64.

THE BLACKPOOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

OCTOBER 13 TO 18.

No written description will avail to make clear the inwardness of this marvellous outpouring of democratic zeal for music making. Blackpool must be visited to be understood. It is true that its manifold simultaneous happenings are embarrassing. You cannot be in five places at once. The only way is to sample, and hope to hear some of the best that is going. This year the Festival occupied one half-day and five whole days (10 a.m. to about 10.30 p.m.). There were, between six and seven thousand competitors. One of the most remarkable features was the number of adult soloists—over six hundred. To set all these amateur singers working at the searching tests enumerated below was a great educational achievement. Not many people in this country have ever heard Hugo Wolf's great song 'Prometheus.' The pianoforte accompaniment is a fearsome thing, and the vocal part presents much tonal difficulty and demands high powers of interpretation. But forty-four baritones had the courage to attempt it, and the winner of the prize, Mr. Haworth (an over-looker in a mill) sang it very finely. This astonishing skill in interpretation was to be found in almost every class. The children's day as usual had its thrills, Mr. Rathbone's new cantata, 'The Singing Leaves,' was one of its successes, and the action-songs provided the customary entertainment. Interest centred on the choirs in the Mixed-Voice Challenge Shield Class. Here there were pitted against one another some of the most highly-trained small choirs to be found in the country. Mr. Whittaker's famous choir gave a stirring performance of Wolf's descriptive chorus, 'The Mad Fire Rider,' but it was left to the Halifax Madrigal Society under Mr. Shepley to provide the dramatic sensation of the Festival. Their interpretation of this piece was electrifying—one of the most memorable achievements even of the Blackpool Festival.

Below we give the results in the chief choral and vocal solo classes, and some detailed criticisms of the two chief classes. As our space is limited we postpone the record of instrumental and other results till our next issue. The children's competitions are reported in THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

The adjudicators were: Dr. W. G. McNaught, Dr. R. R. Terry, Messrs. Michael Balling, Frederick Austin, J. A. Rodgers, Hermann Klein, F. Bonavia, G. Rathbone, W. Granger, R. J. Forbes, Chas. H. Fogg, Walter S. Nesbitt, Madame Marie Brema, Madame Edith Hands, and Mrs. Mary Davies.

Never has a Festival been worked more smoothly than this one. This happy result was secured by the experience and ability of Mr. Lionel H. Franceys, the honorary secretary, Mr. Frank Howard, the general secretary, Councillor J. Collins, and a host of helpers.

THE TESTS.

(a) 'Cedan l'Antiche' ('Yield up your ancient fame'), Madrigal for S.S.A.A.T.B., by Luca Marenzio. This splendid madrigal in its complete form has only recently become available. It is full of the devices that are characteristic of the school, and is worked up in a masterly fashion to a great climax. In the key (C) in which it is printed it sounds high. Probably there would be a gain in sonority if it were sung in B flat.

(b) 'Sleepless dreams' (Ethel Smyth).—This is written for chorus and orchestra (on this occasion represented by the pianoforte). The opening section comprises about fifty bars sung by the baritones only, and is deeply expressive. The full choral section is chiefly in sostenuto style, and demands striking contrasts of tone-colour. There is one great climax, and the end is charmingly peaceful. Altogether a fine specimen of this gifted composer's style.

(c) 'The Mad Fire Rider' (Hugo Wolf).—This also is written for chorus and orchestra. A fire breaks out in a mill. A horseman rides right into the blaze. Later, his skeleton and that of his horse are discovered, and they fall to dust. The poem is by E. Mörike. The translation used—the only one available—is a poor one. But it did not prevent the terrible dramatic intensity of the setting from making a thrilling effect. The vocal part does not present extreme tonal difficulty, but the physical demands made by the dynamic contrasts, ranging from the most gossamer-like pp to the most thunderous ff, are exceptional.

All choirs sang (a) and (b) in the afternoon. Five (see *) were selected to sing (c) at the evening meeting.

The adjudicators in the Final Competition were Dr. McNaught, Mr. Balling, Dr. R. R. Terry, and Mr. J. A. Rodgers.

MR. ALDOUS'S LANCASTER CHOIR.—(a) A resonant start. Perhaps somewhat too emphatic. Runs not very clear. A dark, sombre resonance. Some rough tonal attack. Always with vitality, and the rhythmic attack well controlled. Soprano and alto too aggressive, determined, biting. The runs again showed want of skill in vocalisation. Laboured, pp. 11, 12. Missed the big swell of the wave of the cres., p. 13. Runs on p. 13 defective. P. 15, ff, bad attack. A fairly broad rendering often nearly first-rate. Disappointed expectations. Well-equipped choir. Tone of sopranos and altos needs special attention. (b) Baritone solo: Duly sombre—mystic. Fairly smooth, but more sostenuto conceivably better. Worked up with fine judgment, taste, and interpretation. pp beautifully veiled, yet musical. Chorus: Again the pensive note. Going rhythmically, although leisurely. Climax splendid. Intonation excellent. In view of what had gone before, the climax at section 13 was, not so big as expected. On the whole a finely conceived and controlled interpretation. Many subtle touches. The only point to criticise was the climax.

BARROW MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—(a) Hollow rather; lacked sweetness. Vigorous attack. Runs showed skill. First sopranos sometimes not blendful. P. 5 lacked the great buoyancy called for. Execution not very highly finished. Too conscious of the notes and the book. ff, p. 11, a fine point here. P. 13, second score laboured. The rhythm did not attract—did not flow. Lacked freedom and spontaneity. (b) Baritone solo: Nice tone; but not mysterious in its colour. No definite mood. Not arabesque—rather too angular. Disposed to point; missed sleekness; was almost declamatory. The end was better as sostenuto. Choir began finely. This time with a mood. Yet the disposition to show the time too evident. Too march-like. A great climax of warm tone. Continued to interest as vocal tone, but not as a conception. Poem not deeply felt. Nothing subtle or appealing.

COVENTRY CO-OPERATIVE FESTIVAL CHOIR.—(a) Fairly full tone of a unified character. Rational pace. Controlled. P. 5 capital. Piano beautiful blend; dainty rhythm. Splendid touches; masterful. Vitality everywhere; p. 10 fine; ff sung, not shrieked. A brainy performance. (b) Baritone: Not quite in tune. Deficient in emotional warmth. Better later, some mystery and agitation expressed—some eager pining. Rough in expansions. More mood in pp than in the forte, which was sometimes uninspired tone. -Chorus: Nearly a first-rate sostenuto, creeping, insinuating. Intonation rocky at section 10; but the expression was good. Mockery fine, top p. 10. Enunciation excellent. The climaxes were transfixing—powerful. Sopranos flinched intonation p. 13, particularly at the A sharp. Did not recover pitch, unfortunately. But the mood was right.

STRETTFORD GLEE AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—(a) Some 'tearing' top sopranos. Spirited, good pace. Runs fair. Not completely unified as attack. Became somewhat monotonous. The triple time done perfunctorily. The light parts fairly delicate. Not well equipped with rich resonant voices, although the choir is to a great extent a good one. A disposition to hurry, giving a feverish effect. Some entries too forcible—aggressive accents. Meant well, but not quite music. (b) Baritone: Duly veiled, and with a mood. An impressive performance. Not a great character, but it revealed a message. Chorus: Good opening. Then an intrusive sf—and again later. Showed capacity. Not sufficient equipment to secure an overwhelming climax. Quite well wrought up. Later only the dark, sombre expression there. Not much else to interest. Kept very well in tune.

BLACKPOOL GLEE AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—(a) Rich tone; but not so very good as chording. Smart pace. Runs good. Tonal attack, although alert, not faultless. Sopranos sometimes displayed an undue pointing of the accent, a bite—something like an orchestral fiddle grind. 'Now in the' (p. 10) rather feverish. Abundant life always. The chording not always true. Did not fully realise the breadth called for and the perfectly controlled style of delivery. Nevertheless, a very good performance. (b) Baritone: Began fairly well, and soon got impressive. Tone rich. Execution firm and clear. Melancholy—brown mood. Very reposeful as execution, although so finely expressive. Chorus: Very fine entry. Significant mood. Subtle. Section 12: working up was splendid to 13th section. Thrilling, powerful interpretation. Last page very fascinating.

BLACKBURN CONTEST CHOIR.—(a) Rather shrill sopranos. Not very much care as vocal delivery, frequent defects as to this. The blend not always satisfactory. Plenty of vitality and energy. Very confident. The rhythm did not often satisfy. The runs kept on being insecure. A hurry occasionally. High colour striven for. Needs more polish and finish. Rather too much in full-steam-ahead style. (b) Baritone: Well veiled and moody. Tone, however, not completely musical. 'That fan my pillow' not clear. Careful generally and with considerable appreciation. Chorus: At once a correct atmosphere. Occasionally stiff, mechanical rhythmic tread of the accents of the bar seemed intrusive. But there were many points to admire. P. 14 not quite in tune, and the mood colour indefinite.

SALFORD MUNICIPAL CHORAL SOCIETY.—(a) Nervous, agitated start. Rhythm not defined, too four-like in character. Rarely swung in two. Tone fair. Some intrusive keenness. Therefore no attractive blend. Some earnest enthusiastic sopranos squeezed the production. Some faulty piano and one or two well-wrought-up climaxes. Runs quite creditable. Fairly fluent. Very responsive to conductor's demands. Needs more beauty of tone and treatment. (b) Baritone: Nice tone, but no mood that was appropriate and at all interesting. Too square, and inclined to be declamatory. Formal as expression. Chorus: Tone blended well—the execution was firm, but not illuminated by meaning. Very well prepared as technique. Colours used, but did not convey a design—a character. Kept quite well in tune. Occasional peeps of moody expression.

HALIFAX MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—(a) Solid, firm tone. Spirited, with much spring in the rhythm. Two beats in the bar. Quite right. Splendid entries—so brilliant, with musical tone. Page 10 capital. Brilliant high G, p. 11. Later with much charm of rhythm and tone. Sopranos hard, p. 12, bottom. A glorious stream of pure tone generally. Splendid resource and exhilarating rhythm. (b) Baritone: Very impressive. Mystic. Awesome and occasionally passionate. Section 6 wonderful. Later the veiling of tone was fine. Held rapt attention. The end was perfect in its way. Chorus: Again living up to the conception. Constant subtlety of tone treatment and beauty of expression. Portamento justified by its beauty at section 15. Bar 2, last page, soprano B flat showed slight giving way as to intonation. Accompanist, who all through did very well, was salvation here. A thing to listen to, not to criticise.

SALE AND DISTRICT MUSICAL SOCIETY.—(a) A bright scintillating tone (some slight taint in the sopranos). Full and rich generally. A finely equipped choir. Good pace, and the rhythm with considerable impelling life. Sweetly blendful piano—charming. Emerging into a well-proportioned climax. The treble-tone attracted the ear in forte by its singular brightness. The fervour was remarkable and the rhythm was attractively elastic. Runs good. The last note was rather 'kicked' off. (b) Baritone: Firm, clean, sweet tone. Had a mood, if not a very pronounced one. Melancholy—cheerlessness. Technically so good, and the interpretation grew in interest. Chorus: Soon displayed breadth and mastery. A brain at work influencing. Ladies voices became lovely—enchantingly expressive (p. 10.) How magnificent! Moving, entrancing. Alto 'ghostly' tone, 4th bar last page, was a startling touch of colour.

THE FINAL TEST.

'The mad fire rider' (Hugo Wolf).

MR. ALDOUS'S LANCASTER CHOIR.—(c) Not a real vocal whisper. Not alarming—ominous enough. Very alert and clean—no tags. Free tone. High colour. Too slow at bar 48. Attack exhibited splendid vigour. Alto bars 77-80 very well done. The difficult pp, bar 93, just managed. Last section: not simple enough at once, and did not grow into great dramatic intensity. On the whole picturesque, if not startlingly vivid.

COVENTRY CO-OPERATIVE FESTIVAL CHOIR.—(c) At once some fear and tremor. Alarming! Portentous. Bar 48 better faster. Here very slow, but beautifully sung. Bars 55, 56, 'Woe to thee' too slow—not savagely intense enough to excite. Bars 93, 94, the high pp here very good. Words always excellent. Coda: A beautiful blend. A shudder well expressed at 'gruesome sight.' The whispered tone at 116, 117, 'Hush, to dust it falleth,' deeply impressive—another shudder. The low tenor C sharp felt rather than heard at the end. In neither case were the composer's instructions followed as to tempo primo, but no special treatment condoned.

BLACKPOOL GLEE AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—(c) The pace at last! Vivid and terrible. Very exciting. Horror realised. Execution wonderfully confident. Bars 48, 49, judgment shown in not pulling up too much. The climax later, 'Woe to thee,' intense. The high pp at 93, 94 was rather nervously done. Coda well treated—masterly. A great achievement.

HALIFAX MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—(c) Faster still. Vivid. Frightfully sinister! Fiercely impetuous, but never uncontrolled. Tone splendidly full and musical. The long pause before the Coda was very dramatic. The direction near the end as to tempo primo was abandoned. Daring, but justified by its extraordinary expression. A memorable performance. Left us all excited. The four judges were unanimous in awarding full marks.

SALE AND DISTRICT MUSICAL SOCIETY.—(c) Good pace. Not a very intense or exciting expression. All well controlled. Had many fine features. The colours not so vivid as they were in the previous choir's performance.

Tone always had beauty—charm of blend. Coda: Thoughtful and expressive. The horror of the crumbling skeleton was finely expressive. W. G. McN.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Class).

(Six entries.)

Tests: (a) 'Venj Creator Spiritus' (Berlioz).

(b) 'Music, when soft voices die' (Julius Harrison).

(Criticisms by one of the audience.)

ST. JAMES.—(a) Slow, but still with a feeling of movement. Tender, full, rich tone. Altos, a specially deep resonance. The dialogue between the solis and the full choir was quite charming. Some suggestion of fatigue. Not much attempt at warmth of expression. A rational and well-controlled performance. (b) Tranquil, pensive beginning. Altos again particularly fine. Intonation not always true. On p. 6 arresting because of its high, passionate climax. Then a welcome return to the pensive style. A fine conception, very ably worked out. (1st.)

MR. CLIFFORD HIGGINS'S CHOIR.—(a) A bright, resonant tone. Had an appeal of its own. Rather good pace. Colour contrasts more vivid than No. 1. Perhaps too fervid. Soli parts not sufficiently sostenuto. Had rhythmic interest, p. 3, very tenderly expressive. A broken phrase later. A different conception from that of No. 1. More excited, piteous—more feminine in its outlook. A strong appeal to emotion, but was it called for? (b) Again some traces of fever that impelled attention. Tone well-controlled in pp. The forte top of p. 5 dramatic, although not so very careful as to tone—a trifle unrestrained. Climax, p. 7, exciting, if fitfully musical. End bars a welcome and beautiful contrast. (2nd.)

MR. WHITTAKER'S CHOIR.—(a) Very expressive appeal at the opening. Subtle in its shading. Soli sections not absolutely dead in tune. The full choir 'tore' tone once or twice—tone of trebles not quite unified. Altos splendid. Some strong contrasts, perhaps not quite in due relation. The end was beautiful. An impressive interpretation that was not obviously careful of small details. (b) Charming start. Delicate, velvety rhythm. Tone full and sweet. The piu lento did not secure its due effect. Chording here and there not pure. First sopranos troubled apparently. A passionate expansion to the ff. Then a little wearied, although always with pathos.

MR. ALDOUS'S CHOIR.—(a) Well-proportioned tone-force. A real mf, not f. Clear and sweet quality. In places superbly rich and blendful. Perfect finish. Pace seemed just right. One over-urged forte, too fervent for this piece. Attack electrically exact. Fluent delivery. Was the expression too intense—tragic? Certainly it seemed that all the mood expression to be got out of the piece was extracted. A fine, plastic, well-controlled performance of outstanding merit. (b) Again the controlled tone and fine treatment. An unearthly, ghostly, alto passage, bar 4, was a great effect. More of this mood would have been welcome. Firm discords. Absolute unity. The cres. to ff a dream of perfection. The end was superb. A thrilling performance. (3rd.)

COLNE ROAD.—(a) Sweet tone. Delicate handling of rhythm. Sure, firm execution. Could expand with fine tone. Colour contrasts strong. Technically excellent in almost every way. A rough attack on p. 4. An interpretation of some nobility. (b) A well-intended start, but voices not able to stand the restraint without showing it. Smart pace. Warm tone. Everywhere words charged with meaning. The big chordal climax very good, although not as firm as it was in No. 1 choir. Intonation not always perfectly safe. Low E in alto a great asset. A good conception nearly realised.

PADIHAM.—(a) Fine tone and blend. Alto very rich. Rhythm somewhat stiff; it lagged, and the execution became formal. Later the rhythm was treated daintily—a style scarcely called for. A beautiful pp. Made some appeal as music but not as interpretation. (b) Not precisely in tune at the start, some warm emotion in the expression. Became over-fervent, impulsive. The pensive features missed. The gusts and bursts of tone were almost dramatic. The big chord was a good climax. On the whole did not realise all the moods of the piece.

Do you know why you cannot Play at Sight?

Good sight-players will tell you that, when playing at sight, their fingers seem to fall automatically upon the right notes. They are not conscious of any mental exertion in translating the printed symbols into the appropriate muscular actions.

Many pianists who are able to play difficult pieces or selections well after practice, are not able to play much less difficult selections at first sight. This is simply because they have not acquired the ability to dispense with the conscious mental translation of musical symbols into muscular actions.

The establishment of this automatic connection between eye and hand can easily be effected by any pianist. Three months' practising for less than half-an-hour daily is sufficient to enable any pianist to play all his or her new music at first sight. But this can be done in this time only by the aid of

The Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing.

Booklet, containing a full explanation of the methods employed, sent post-free to any Pianist on application to

BRINSMEAD PIANOS

KENTFORD, SUFFOLK,

10. 3. 13.

Messrs. BRINSMEAD & SONS,

Dear Sirs,—May I convey to you my sincere appreciation of your fine pianos. I have used them at the bulk of my concerts, and the instruments played on at the three of my concerts this year have been even better in tone and singing quality than any I have had before. That any one in England should have an idea that English Pianos are not superior in durability, power, and workmanship passes my comprehension. I wish you all continued success in the manufacture of a first-class instrument. Perhaps the most remarkable quality of your pianos is the freedom of touch.

Most sincerely yours,

(Signed) JOSEF HOLBROOKE.

MAURICE RAVEL.

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

DECEMBER 1, 1913.

MAURICE RAVEL.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

Of all the members of the younger French school none—including even M. Claude Debussy—has irritated and perplexed critics more, nor been made the subject of warmer and more protracted discussion, than M. Maurice Ravel (born at Ciboure, near Saint Jean de Luz, in the Basses-Pyrénées, March 7, 1875).

His first work, 'Sites Auriculaires' * (a rather far-fetched title, best translated 'Landscapes for the ear'), played in February, 1898, at the Société Nationale, attracted little notice. But the second, an overture, 'Shéhérazade,' produced the following year by the same Society, met with a mixed reception, and the few critics who noticed it proved thoroughly unsympathetic: the young composer was branded as not only a dangerous anarchist, but as an incompetent bungler.

M. Maurice Ravel was at that time a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied pianoforte with M. Charles de Bériot, harmony with M. Hector Pessard, counterpoint and fugue with M. Gédalge, and composition with M. Gabriel Fauré. In 1901 he won the second Grand Prize for composition; but after that he fell a victim to undisguised ostracism on the part of the judges, and never succeeded in winning the First Grand Prize, or 'Prix de Rome,' which generally follows as a natural sequel. Things went thus far, that in 1905 (the year after which, reaching the age-limit, he could no longer compete) he was not even passed at the preliminary examinations—a mere matter of form, and established in order to prevent insufficiently experienced candidates from entering the competition. So flagrant a partiality gave rise to severe comments in the Press—even critics who viewed M. Ravel's music with little sympathy taking up the cudgels in his favour, and an indirect but obvious consequence of the event being that M. Théodore Dubois resigned his directorship of the Conservatoire and was replaced by M. Gabriel Fauré—precisely M. Ravel's master.

In the meanwhile he had composed several works, all of which were produced at the concerts of the Société Nationale. In 1902 his pianoforte pieces 'Pavane pour une Infante défunte' and 'Jeux d'eau,' played by that unsurpassed champion of modern music, M. Ricardo Viñes, were received with great favour. And from that time it became evident that the composer, although he displayed a somewhat over-fastidious taste in his choice of subjects and also in his modes of treatment, was not to be made light of.

The String Quartet (1904), a spirited and broader work, turned the scales even further. In 1905 the pianoforte set 'Miroirs' was on the whole favourably received; but in 1907 the wonderful, surprisingly original settings of Jules Renard's 'Histoires Naturelles' gave occasion to new, even more furious onslaughts, and to a great display of indignation among the majority of critics.

Since then, almost every new work of M. Ravel has been eagerly commented, made the subject of enthusiastic praise, and of violent attacks. Among the chief indictments alleged by his adversaries, none has been repeated more often, nor appeared more plausible, than the one branding him as a plagiarist of M. Claude Debussy. Many writers have also objected strongly to the 'dryness' and the 'artificiality' of his music.

To say that musicians imitate M. Debussy has nowadays become as stereotyped an argument as it was, not long ago, to say that musicians imitated Wagner. The point having been examined at some length in a former article of the Musical Times (December, 1911: 'The origin of to-day's musical idiom'), may be dismissed in a very few words. It will suffice to say that whoever attempts a thorough comparison between M. Debussy's music and M. Ravel's will not fail to note many conclusive points of fact. In M. Debussy's music, for instance, the whole-tone scale and the various chords of the ninth play an all-important part; whereas in M. Ravel's the former almost never appears, and the latter appear very seldom. M. Ravel also gives far greater a place to rhythm than M. Debussy does. As regards form and methods of working-out he remains far nearer to tradition. Lastly, his music is very different in tone and in spirit, lacking the tenderness, the occasional touches of sentimentality or of romanticism that give to M. Debussy's its characteristic charm.

This last remark leads us to consider the subject of the other stricture—viz., the artificiality of M. Ravel's art—which, in a way, is beyond question. One might say, indeed, that artificiality is natural to M. Ravel. He is sensitive enough, and thoroughly sincere; but the topics that appeal to his imagination are few, and perhaps rather peculiar as a rule. With a lesser insight, he might have fought shy of his own instincts; but being remarkably purposeful, shrewd, and cool-headed, he has deliberately yielded to his nature, as every true artist should. When one comes to know him well, one can but acknowledge that he has displayed no slight discrimination in his choice of subjects. And a significant fact is that the majority of those subjects—whether in song or in instrumental pieces—have tempted no other musician.

Whereas, for instance, there are scores of poems by Verlaine that have been set to music half a dozen times, if not a dozen, the delightful little piece 'Sur l'herbe' remains M. Ravel's unshared appanage. He has been, I believe, the first of the contemporaries to set to music poems by Clement Marot ('Deux Epigrammes,' 1900); many have since followed the example, and taken notice, for musical purposes, of the early French poets. One can hardly imagine who but he among all would have dreamt of setting to music Jules Renard's clever but laboured 'Histoires Naturelles'; one can absolutely feel that none but he could have succeeded in disengaging the vein of genuine pathos, humour, and picturesqueness that lay hidden under the crafty arrangement of the words.

* It consisted of two pieces for two pianofortes, of which one, 'Mabanera,' was orchestrated later and found place in the 'Rapsodie espagnole,' and the other, 'Entre Cloches,' has probably developed into 'La Vallée des Cloches' in the set 'Miroirs' for pianoforte.

Among his instrumental pieces, too, many are unique in poetic theme and in execution—as, in the set 'Miroirs,' the 'Alborada del Gracioso' (Morning-song of the Jester), or the weird, wistful, forcible little tone-picture, 'Oiseaux tristes'; and the whole of the set, 'Gaspard de la Nuit.'

Even when he happens to select poetic subjects that other musicians have treated, one has little trouble in perceiving typical differences in the modes of treatment. An explanation of the differences in scheme and in spirit that are noticeable between his 'Jeux d'eau,' and Franz Liszt's 'Les Jeux d'eau à la villa d'Este,' has been attempted in a former article (Musical Times, June, 1913: 'The problem of Programme-music'); and the comparison illustrates at once that absolute lack of sentimentality and revery, in the current sense of both terms, that is M. Ravel's chief distinctive trait. Similarly, one can compare the 'Prélude à la nuit' in the 'Rapsodie Espagnole,' with M. Debussy's admirable 'Les parfums de la nuit,' in the orchestral suite 'Ibéria.' Thus it will be seen that although in suggestiveness M. Ravel's music yields to none, it does not aim at suggesting in explicit-wise the composer's own emotions; but rather, at affording a theme upon which the hearer's imagination may set to work, so as to supply further emotional comment.

M. Ravel's latest work (unpublished for the present) consists of three songs on poems by Mallarmé, two of which have recently been set by M. Debussy. Although vocal music can hardly be expected to illustrate the point at issue as clearly as instrumental music, it is quite possible that once again a comparison will prove instructive.

The very deliberateness, the remorseless limitation of the emotional range of music that are fundamental characteristics of M. Ravel's art might in a less gifted composer be defects. In him they are part and parcel of the artistic individuality; and they serve his ends excellently, despite the fact that by them he is debarred from indulging in certain dreamy, complacent moods that have been propitious to most composers. Even whilst acknowledging the apparent absence of a whole category of affections, one might well be satisfied with what M. Ravel obviously gives: utmost delicacy and refinement, perfect balance and concinnity, a wealth of novel, attractive material, skilfully used and displayed in admirable light. But the absence of emotion is only apparent; and although the emotion itself is subdued, and its expression always toned down and recondite, many instances may be adduced in which genuine feeling asserts itself under the industrious show of impassivity, whilst in others the composer drops the mask altogether. Extremely characteristic in that respect are the 'Oiseaux tristes,' 'La vallée des cloches,' or in the set 'Gaspard de la Nuit,' the second piece, 'Le Gibet'—the last two being his nearest approaches to actual revery in instrumental music; 'L'Indifférent,' one of the set of songs 'Shéhérazade,' his nearest approach to a love-song; in the 'Histoires Naturelles,' the wonderful dreamy note with which ends 'Le Grillon,' to the words 'And in the still landscape poplar-trees, like upraised fingers, point towards the moon'; and the deep, diffident tenderness with which 'Le martin-pêcheur' is informed.

Of course, some may prefer a less discreet eloquence, that would not shun the more current emotions, but dwell upon each lovingly; and indeed it is something unwonted to see a number of musicians deliberately discard what has been one of music's chief resources. The objection has often been made with respect to M. Debussy: but no composer carries the principle so far as M. Ravel. It is, certainly, the artist's unquestionable right to select his own methods of conveying emotion; and whether we are prepared to follow him on his own ground remains a matter of temperament and education, absolutely outside the scope of critical argument.

Even his adversaries concede now that M. Ravel is an extraordinarily skilful artist; it may to some extent be his very skill that, dazzling and bewildering certain hearers, prevents them from piercing through the surface of his music and enjoying its emotional appeal.

His supreme command of his art is attested by the fact that he seldom wanders, and errs even more seldom. Admitting his right to deal with his subjects according to his own nature, one shall find that he generally succeeds in doing exactly and thoroughly what he wanted—a thing that, on the whole, may be said of very few musicians. A clumsy transition in 'Jeux d'eau,' a certain vagueness or weakness of expression in 'Noctuelles' ('Miroirs'), or in the song 'Les Grands Vents venus d'Outre-mer,' are exceptional instances to the contrary.

Even the delicate, intricate fretwork of a pianoforte piece like the 'Alborada del Gracioso' produces a wealth of broad, rich, mellow colours; and even if when studying 'Le Gibet' one notices that, technically speaking, it is but an elaborate play of harmonic effects round a persistent holding-note, one cannot deny the supremely artistic effect of the piece as a whole.

M. Ravel is ever showing himself as gifted with surpassing technique. If his pianoforte pieces are the outcome of exceptional ingenuity and untiring imagination, I think one may also say that after Rimsky-Korsakoff, and with M. Paul Dukas and M. Stravinsky, he is the best orchestrator of our times.

His orchestral works, however, are not very numerous. They comprise, besides the 'Rapsodie Espagnole' and the one-act comic opera 'L'Heure Espagnole' (produced at the Opéra-Comique in 1911), the ballet 'Daphnis et Chloé,' which is one of his most important achievements; also the arrangement in pantomime-form of the suite 'Ma Mère l'Oye,' originally written as a pianoforte duet; and a few songs with orchestral accompaniment: 'Noël des Jouets' and the set 'Shéhérazade.' One of the pieces 'Miroirs,' 'Une barque sur l'Océan,' has also been orchestrated, and produced in this new form in 1909.

The greater part of his output having been mentioned in the course of this article, it will suffice to add to the list his Sonatine (1905) and his 'Valse Nobles et Sentimentales' (1911) for pianoforte; his beautiful song 'Sainte,' to words by Mallarmé (1896), first in date of his typical works; and his remarkable accompaniments to five Greek folk-songs. Another little-known set of accompanied folk-songs, some of them extremely beautiful, has been published at Moscow (Jurgenson), after taking the first prize at an international competition.

M. Ravel has a remarkable gift for teaching, as the present writer, having witnessed lessons given by him to brother composers, may well testify. His ideas on art are of the soundest. For instance, he strives very sedulously to enable his pupils to acquire a technique of their own, and to prevent them from acquiring mannerisms. 'Teaching,' he remarks, 'should aim at disengaging and strengthening the pupil's individuality; at teaching him how, by studying the masters, he must learn not to ape them, but to study himself, as they have done.' He considers the affectation of modernism as unwholesome as the academical tendencies to which many contemporary composers remain subject. He has often been heard to remark that the influence of German music is most dangerous, far more dangerous than that of Italian music—'barring, of course, the modern verists,' he adds, 'who are no musicians at all. But until their advent Italian music, even when facile and even rather vulgar, remained musical—which German music often forgets to do.'

He has of late taken to writing criticisms, in which he shows himself very pugnacious and even violent. Talking, for instance, of the defects of Liszt (whom, on the whole, he admires greatly) he says: 'It is to those defects that Wagner owes his turgescence; Strauss, his churlish enthusiasms; Franck, the ponderousness of his ideality; the Russians, their, at times, tinsel picturesqueness; the modern French, the simpering of their grace. But,' he adds, 'it is to him that all those dissimilar composers owe the best of their qualities.'

Noticing the revival of 'Fervaal,' he wrote, after expatiating on the deplorable results of Wagner's influence upon M. d'Indy: 'A symbol even more pregnant than the composer wishes it to be is afforded by Fervaal, who, the dead body of a woman in his arms, climbs the heights, singing the victory of life and love.'

M. Ravel has for some years been contemplating a musical setting to Gerhardt Hauptmann's 'Versunkene Glocke' in M. A. Ferdinand Hérold's French translation. Some time ago, after having written part of the music, he set it aside, and is now starting again on fresh lines.

WORD-PLAY IN MUSIC.

By H. WALFORD DAVIES.

Lewis Carroll happened to give notable advice to musicians in his playful parody, 'take care of the sense and the sounds will take care of themselves.' Apart from the precarious charms of novel sounds, it is the chords with sense behind them that have interest. Sounds that have two or more significances are capable of double interest, if they are deftly used. As felicitous word-play sometimes throws magical light across conversation, so what may be termed 'chord-play' affords some of the most delightful and appropriate mental surprises in the course of great music. Many chords are capable of such treatment; but those which most readily lend themselves are those which divide the octave into equal portions.

* Songs marked * also with orchestral accompaniment.

In just intonation any equal division of the octave is manifestly impossible at every point; it can neither be divided into two equal tritones, three equal major thirds, four equal minor thirds, six equal tones, nor twelve equal semitones. Pianoforte tuners probably know this best. A musician who has neither acoustical knowledge nor time to acquire it, and who is trained in a long usage of the tempered scale, is handicapped in the matter, and perhaps only recognises its significance now and again under favourable conditions, even though his ear be sensitive. For example, the subtle difference between the major and minor tones seems for practical purposes altogether unobserved, except in a few cases among singers or string players. It was said that Joachim, in such a passage as would play the greater tone first and the lesser second; but the writer has been told that in descending he again took the larger step first:

Major tone. (9:8) Minor tone. (16:15)

If this were so, it would appear that he was led less by a harmonic instinct which sought a perfectly tuned fifth above the dominant in the penultimate chord, than by a melodic one which tended to take the larger step first in leaning towards its point of rest. Doubtless euphonic considerations often cause singers and fiddlers in sustaining chords—whether in ancient or modern works—to choose justly-tuned fifths, fourths, sixths, and thirds whenever they can. But however all this may be, it seems clear that the physical difference between the just and tempered versions of any concord is of slender consequence compared with the mental difference to a musician between such tempered synonyms as:

- (1.)  and ;
- (2.)  and ;
- (3.)  and ;
- (4.)  and ;
- (5.)  and ;
- (6.)  and ;

and all other inversions of the above series.

The out-of-tune (tempered) scale was doubtless adopted as the lesser of two evils, not for choice. Its out-of-tuneness involved a general but slight imperfection of all intervals in the harmonic system except the octave. It cannot be too clearly borne in mind that the imperfection is only physical, and that a perfect musical idea is not necessarily precluded by imperfect embodiment, but that on the contrary the mind has a certain transforming power to see or hear the perfective through the defective.

This last fact is certainly strikingly illustrated in the case of the tempered scale of Western music. In that Bach advocated it zealously and justified it gloriously in the 'Forty-eight,' he cannot be accused of lowering his ideal of perfection. On the contrary he immensely extended it. But he lowered the standard of physical perfection, that was all. An executive artist is rightly concerned with minute faultlessness of form at every point. The imaginative artist is concerned still more with comparatively limitless perfections of conception. Doubtless Bach as a workman—that is, as an artisan in the world of sound—was as desirous as anyone for perfect euphony when it could be had without any disproportionate sacrifice; but he saw both the obstacles and the possibilities beyond them, and as an artist he was concerned with issues greater than euphony. He was, as is well known, finely reckless of physical strain and taxed his singers', players', and audiences' powers of endurance to breaking point, in his pursuit of the perfect thought. The truth would seem to be that where an artist can obtain perfection, there any imperfections are intolerable. But if flaws cannot be removed without damaging larger issues or hindering larger progress, then such flaws are negligible.

If the synonyms quoted above be examined first by the eye and then by the ear, it will appear that their varying significance is clear to the one but entirely hidden to the other. At first this may incline the observer to class the differences between them as mere paper-differences of none but a theoretic importance; and 'paper-music' is notoriously misguided, dreary, and wrong-headed. But further thought tends to suggest that the very definite differences of effect to the eye have some sure foundation in aural experience. By a glance at the following:

two different thoughts are certainly awakened in the mind of musicians. One suggests smooth things, the other poignancy. By association of idea they raise quite different expectancies, since D flat has so often been heard to be followed by C, Eb or F, while C# has still more often moved to D and only very rarely to the other notes. The difference is not less real nor less momentous because it cannot be definitely realised till each has a context—for example, as follows:

In the English language the word 'box' has definitely different meanings: these differences are not less real because they are entirely dependent upon context for clearness.

Thomas Tallis

: THOMAS : TALLIS :

The portrait of Tallis was engraved in 1726 by G. Van der Gucht for Nicholas Haym, who intended it as an illustration in a 'History of Music' he had written and proposed to publish. For lack of patronage the work was not proceeded with. The picture shows Tallis as left-handed, but doubtless this is owing to the error of the engraver in not allowing for the reversal of the print.

The signatures are facsimiles of those contained in the Waltham Abbey volume of musical treatises, which passed into Tallis's possession at the dissolution of the monastery and are now in the British Museum. (Lansdowne MS. 763.)

preserved in the reference library attached to the Church. Diligent search in those collections has failed to discover the missing reference. I have had frequent appeals from musical historians for help in the matter, and have at various times since 1876 made endeavours to clear up the matter, recognising the fact that some folk had come to regard the statement of Tallis at Waltham, to quote one of my inquirers, as a 'will o' the wisp.' Recently questioners have again come forward, and I therefore determined to make a further effort to discover the authentic record. The officials at the Record Office have been kind in helping me; but at last I engaged the assistance of an expert worker at the Record Office, and thanks to her knowledge and industry, I am now able to identify the long-sought-for document.

The manuscript is endorsed on the exterior 'Co. Essex. Inventory of the Goods of Waltham Holy Cross. 31. Hen. 8th.'

Its contents are an inventory of the goods of Waltham Abbey taken by the Chancellor of the Augmentation Office on March 24, 31 Henry VIII., 1540, the date of the dissolution of the Abbey. There is also a list of the pensions granted to the Abbot and Brethren: the amounts are tabulated in two columns, designated 'Pensions' and 'Rewards.' This is followed by a list headed 'Servantes Wages and Rewards,' and here, fourth on the list, appears the name Thomas Talys, with twenty shillings wages and twenty shillings reward. The forty-fourth name is John Bosten, with three shillings wages and three shillings reward. He also was organist of Waltham Abbey: probably he officiated in the Nave of the Abbey, which served as the church of the Parishioners, whilst Talys's duties were to play in the Monks' Choir where there was 'a greate large payre of organs above, one in the North Quyre and a lesser payre beneth.' There was also 'a lytell payre of organes in the Lady Chapel.' John Bosten remained at Waltham after the dissolution, doubtless engaged by the Parishioners. The Churchwardens' accounts of 1546 contain an entry, 'Paid to John Bosten for mending the Organs twentie pence.'

Investigators can now see the original document at the Record Office by quoting the reference 'Exchequer K. R. Church Goods 114.'

It is interesting to note that Tallis must have come under the notice of King Henry VIII. when one of the Children of His Majesty's Chapel. Born about 1510, afterwards a chorister in St. Paul's Cathedral under Thomas Mulliner, perhaps in 1517, he may have commenced his duties at the Chapel Royal in 1518, and when his voice broke was recommended to the Abbot of Waltham Abbey by the King, who possessed a house in Romeland in that town, and had also two special apartments in Waltham Monastery reserved for his use. It is recorded that the King frequently retired to Waltham Abbey and transacted much important business there.

There is an interesting account printed in the 'Nugæ Antiquæ,' vol. i., page 132, of a letter written by Sir John Harington to Lord Burleigh:

'In an old booke of my father's I read a merrie verse, which for lack of my own, I send by Mr. Bellot, to divert your Lordshippe when, as you say, weighty paine and weightier matters will yield to quips and merriment. This Verse is called The Blacke Sanctus, or Monkes Hymn to Saunte Satane, made when Kyng Henrie had spylede their synginge. My father was wont to say that Kyng Henrie was used in pleasaunte moode to singe this verse; and my father, who had his good countenance, and a goodlie office in his courte, and also his goodlie Esther [this Esther was a natural daughter of the Kyng's, to whom he gave as a dower the lands belonging to the Bathe priory, or a part thereof] to wife, did sometye receive the honour of hearing his own songe, for he made the tune which my man Combe hath sent herewith; having been much skilled in musicke, which was pleasing to the Kyng, and which he learnt in the fellowship of Maister Tallis, when a young man.' It is probable that Tallis went to Waltham Abbey about 1530; ten years afterwards, in 1540, the dissolution of the monastery was effected, and no doubt the musician passed immediately into the service of the King. Tallis married in 1552 and lived 'in love full three and thirty years with his wife' Joan, who survived him; he died in 1585, and was buried in the Parish Church of Greenwich. No doubt at the time of his decease he was in attendance on Queen Elizabeth at her Palace at Greenwich.

Occasional Notes.

We had hoped to be able to print in our present issue an article by Mr. A. Friedländer showing the connection of early Christian music with ancient Jewish music, and dealing especially with the origin of Neumes. Owing to some typographical difficulties we are compelled to postpone the appearance of this article until January. This explanation is made because there have been some public announcements stating that the article would be published in December.

The remarks of Mr. Frederick Corder on Counterpoint as it is taught (see p. 803) will be read sympathetically by numerous students who have writhed and groaned under the yoke of the restrictions imposed by nearly all our examining bodies, and deriving their sanction from mythical authority. It is not that the study of counterpoint is to be deprecated, for it should be regarded as an indispensable feature of every musician's equipment. The contention is that in the artistic application of its essence—the superimposing of melodies—the rules should be deduced from the practice of the acknowledged masters of the art, as they are in modern teaching of harmony, and not dictated by obscure tradition. We all bow down to Bach as the great exemplar of the possibilities of counterpoint, yet at the same time our self-imposed rules show him to be so wrong that he would not pass an elementary examination.

'Parsifal' will be performed at Covent Garden twelve or more times in the course of a five weeks' season of opera in German, commencing on February 2. The other works in the list are 'Tristan und Isolde,' 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Die Walküre,' and Méhul's 'Joseph in Egypt.' The conductors are Herr Arthur Bodanzky and Mr. Albert Coates, of St. Petersburg. The cast includes many of the finest singers of the day. Special preparations are being made for the production of 'Parsifal,' with which the season opens. Mr. J. Comyns Carr is in general authority; Herr Willy Wirk, of Munich, is stage-manager; Mr. Joseph Harker is responsible for the scenery, and M. Comelli for the costumes.

Mr. Rutland Boughton (writing in World's Work for November) gives a full description of his ideas on 'The rights and wrongs of stage-craft' which, to some extent, were recently carried out at Bournemouth (reported in our October issue, p. 664). He states that nothing is more absurd in dramatic art than attempts at realism. In distinguishing between comedy and tragedy, he says that the former may move us as often to tears as to laughter, but in being moved 'we are not drawn within the current of its mood.' But tragedy is at once 'a tenderer, deeper, and more dangerous thing.' 'All-compelling tragic drama involves not merely the figures on the stage, but the very souls of those who look on with any degree of interest and feeling. Tragedy does not allow an audience to look on: it draws them into the heart of the play, and makes them feel and see life from the points of view of the characters themselves.' These are subtle psychological distinctions not easy to understand, especially we should say, in the gallery, not to mention the stalls. We cannot here trace all the long line of argument that brings Mr. Boughton and his clever coadjutor, Mr. Reginald Buckley, to the idea of a 'plastic chorus,' part of whose function it is to represent 'scenery' by various ways of grouping and attitudinising. As a theory the idea seems fantastic, and to make too great a demand upon the imagination of the beholder. One is almost disposed to suggest that imagination would be even freer if there were not this faint realism to stimulate the faculty. The whole matter is one for experience to decide. Meantime, we commend Mr. Boughton's article to the attention of inquirers.

Eurhythmics, according to M. Jaques-Dalcroze, is making considerable progress in this country. Demonstrations with advanced pupils from abroad have been given during November in various centres up and down the country, and have been attended by large audiences. But while these gatherings excite wonder and general interest they are likely to be regarded merely as an attractive entertainment which for educational purposes may be practically sterile. It is therefore satisfactory to know that the teaching centre recently established in London has drawn a large number of students. Although so far successful, the method is still on its trial in this country. It reveals unexpected rhythmic potentialities on the part of young people, but its application to the everyday work of school, and to musical education in particular, has still to be made clear. We are aware that M. Dalcroze grafts a system of sight-singing and ear-training on to his rhythmic exercises, but this is in no sense an outcome or a necessary feature of the rhythmic study.

If opera refuses to pay at high prices it can scarcely be expected to do so where charges for admission range between 2d. and 1s. At the Victoria Hall, familiarly known as the 'Old Vic,' where opera at these prices regularly attracts an eager public, the burden of maintenance falls on the shoulders of those who philanthropically promote the work. The burden so long borne has at length proved too heavy to be supported without help, and an urgent appeal has been sent out for subscriptions. It says: 'If only one-half of those who regularly attend opera and concerts in more fashionable surroundings will send us the sum which only one evening's enjoyment costs them, we shall have the answer we want.' The appeal is signed by H.R.H. Princess Christian (president), the Lord Mayor, the Chairman of the L.C.C., and nine well-known musicians. Subscriptions should be sent to the manager, Miss Lilian Baylis, Royal Victoria Hall, Waterloo Road, S.E., who will gladly give further particulars.

We learn that a League of German music-critics has been formed, with headquarters at Leipsic. The constitution is still undecided, but the aims are clearly formulated. The purpose is to 'improve the social, moral, and intellectual status of the profession.' It is scarcely likely that English music-critics will follow suit, as their status, or their conscience, of course admits of no reproach under these heads. If they were to band together it would be to form a Union and a strike in which the 'men's demands' would be: intelligent sub-editors, a later hour of Press, and no Ballad concerts. The committee of the seriously-minded German Society includes Alfred Heuss (Leipsic), Paul Ehlers (Munich), Paul Bekker (Frankfurt), Lucien Kamienski (Königsberg), and Hermann Springer (Berlin). Membership, we understand, is elective and under strict conditions.

The perennial subject of the reform of Church music has drawn many writers to the columns of the Morning Post during the month of November. Up to the time of our going to Press the discussion was still proceeding. This being so, we reserve a summary of the correspondence until our January number.

Mr. William Wallace has resigned the secretaryship of the Society of British Composers, and Mr. C. Beatty has been appointed in his stead.

SCHOPENHAUER AND MUSIC.

BY ROBERT RALPH.

When the average transcendental philosopher commences to theorise upon music, the result for the earnest student of the art is always interesting, and often enough positively diverting. The difficulty of obtaining from a philosopher an explanation of the phenomenon of music which will be satisfactory to the average composer or critic, perhaps lies in the vastly different standpoints from which artists and world-thinkers regard it. Music to the everyday musician is a perfectly natural thing, such as breathing or talking. To the composer it occupies a larger proportion of his conscious and subconscious mental activities than does even the common verbal speech. He looks at the world through a tonal medium. The philosopher, on the other hand, is looking precisely the opposite way of the binocular. He is seeking an explanation and not infrequently an excuse for the presence of music on the planet, and it must be confessed that most philosophers have been hard pressed in endeavouring to correlate the two entities.

Schopenhauer's views upon musical metaphysics are more than usually acceptable because, apart from his main theory, he has some really stable facts and a fair lay knowledge of music as an art. Many a specifically musical writer has strayed farther from the realms of probability than Schopenhauer. Furthermore he has the divine gift (so rare among transcendentalists) of being able to express his ideas clearly and concisely.

He makes one or two lapses from grace. He falls upon that cardinal mistake which is so common to non-musical minds, of calling minor keys necessarily plaintive or sad, and major keys lively and jolly. Also in endeavouring to reconcile the basis of harmony with some cosmic scheme he is responsible for stating that bass parts always move most slowly as the representative of the crudest mass, and that bass only rises and falls by large intervals, never by one tone (!) He perpetrates one glorious 'howler' as a result of this line of thought when he declares that a quick run or shake in the low notes cannot even be imagined !!! On the other hand he avoids the popular error of conceiving melody as distinct from harmony. He persistently indicates that he regards the term melody as alluding to one indivisible thing, i.e., the sequence of musical thoughts. There are so many musical scribes who have cheerfully run their heads against this rock that it is very refreshing to find a member of the laity who gracefully avoids it. His statement regarding melodic progression is very thoughtful, and paves the way for a further happy stretch of argument where he deals reasonably enough with the different effects produced upon the mind by various types of melodies. All this forms attractive reading for the music-lover.

But it is in the main contention and the very trunk system of Schopenhauer's philosophy that the average musician will be disappointed. Let us freely admit that the task of any philosopher is an enormous one. To reconcile such an elusive thing as the power of music over the human mind with the solar system or the latest type of known palm-cacti, and to find some common ground for the existence of both, is a task which, when accomplished, will convince but few people. Furthermore, those who accept the sage's formula, will only do so by virtue of extraneous admiration for the writer's personality. The tragedy of all abstract knowledge is that its domicile is built upon naked postulates. As Herbert Spencer once naively said, 'You must leap off somewhere,' and to a mere musician the 'will-to-live' of Schopenhauer and the 'thing-in-itself' of Kant seem but intellectual springboards from which we plunge into the infinite space of human ignorance.

After much theorizing and demonstration the only conclusion Schopenhauer arrives at is that music bears no resemblance to his 'world as idea' or the world of nature, but insists upon a parallelism. Upon this unstable and almost unmeaning phrase he manages to build a fine argument anent the specific qualities of music, which, though containing many eloquent passages, tells us little that we did not know before. It is scarcely a revelation to learn that 'if we listen to a symphony we seem to see all the possible events of life and the world taking place in ourselves.' Or again, 'music's representative relation to the world must be very deep, absolutely true, and strikingly accurate, because it is instantly understood by everyone, and has the appearance of a certain infallibility,' makes us feel grateful for sympathetic insight. But when we read that 'music acts directly upon the will, the feelings, passions, and emotions of the hearer, and, unlike other arts, it does not express the ideas or objectification of the will, but directly the will itself,' we know the great philosopher is flirting with platitudes.

Schopenhauer completely ignores the physical effect of music upon the human mind. He does not endeavour to explain the vast difference between emotions which are purely due to æsthetic stimuli (such as the reading of a score by one's fireside) and the gross, physically emotional jerks we experience when we hear a brass band in the street, or the deep boom of a bell. Like every other musical theorist, he does not try to find the borderland between the relative effects of music and sound. The vital thing to decide before we seek an acceptable system of musical metaphysics is what percentage of emotional thrill is derived from æsthetics and how much from physical sound. We know that sound qua sound can occasionally upset our nerves, as, for instance, a clap of thunder, a deep bell-note, or the howl of the wind. These things are certainly not music, but it is surely patent to anyone that at least a proportion of their physical thrill must necessarily enter into our enjoyment of a symphony. This is the very point which Schopenhauer and every other musical thinker overlooks. No one but Darwin has even touched the fringe of the subject, yet it is the very core of all musical reasoning.

On these shifty and very verbal premises Schopenhauer proceeds to expound the art of music to his own satisfaction. Although much of his theorising is solid enough, it is needless to say that he finds himself in a cul-de-sac when he comes to speak of opera. It is rather curious that almost every lay-thinker who writes about music invariably hails opera as the be-all and end-all of the art. Why this should be is exceedingly difficult to explain. Writers upon poetry, painting, or the drama never give so much as a glance at opera, yet musical writers absolutely refuse to see that opera is not exclusively a musical question (vide Wagner and Gluck). There is no valid reason why a musical writer should consider himself bound to discuss the question of opera at all.

Schopenhauer insists rightly upon the abstract qualities of music. He says that the music of an opera, as it is presented in the score, has a completely independent, separate, and as it were, abstract existence for itself, 'to which the incidents and persons of the piece are foreign, and which follows its own unchanging rules; therefore it can produce its full effect without the libretto.'

In the very next sentence he says 'But this music, since it was composed with reference to the drama, is, as it were, the soul of the latter, for in its connection with the incidents, persons and words, it becomes the expression of the inner significance of all those incidents, and the ultimate and secret necessity which depends upon this significance.'

The reader will note that two moments previously Schopenhauer had said that the music of the opera could produce its full effect without the libretto, and to it the incidents and persons of the piece are foreign. Now he tries to argue that on the contrary the music in its connection with the incidents, persons and words, since it was composed with reference to the drama, is indispensable. The thing is self-contradictory, and evidently Schopenhauer half suspected so, for in the latter sentence that I have quoted we see his immediate desire to maunder off into those precious 'secret necessities' or 'inner significances,' and those other all-comprehensive terms of which every transcendental philosopher has so large a stock always on hand.

If the small fact that the libretto, persons, and incidents of an opera are, as Schopenhauer says, indispensable, it becomes more difficult to comprehend his further statement that music never assimilates itself with the natural, and therefore, even when it accompanies the most ludicrous and extravagant farces of the comic opera, it still preserves its essential beauty, purity, and sublimity; and its fusion with these incidents is unable to draw it down from its height, to which all absurdity is really foreign. Thus the profound and serious significance of our existence hangs over the farce and the endless miseries of human life, and never leaves it for a moment.

If we overlook the last sentence, which is a typical chunk of Schopenhauerian pessimism, it is pretty obvious that the philosopher has run his head against the old question of why people tolerate the conjunction of fine music and banal drama in opera. He is at a loss to explain the wild absurdities that occur in nine operas out of ten, and falls back upon the weak statement about the serious significance of our existence hanging over farce. Surely if there is one thought above another that does not enter the opera-lover's head when he is listening to his favourite arias, it is the relationship of our existence to eternal things. The presence of music at operatic and theatrical performances cannot be excused upon these grounds.

It is precisely at such points as this where abstract philosophic systems break down. Schopenhauer's theory fares no worse than any other 'transcendental' explanation of the phenomenon of music. Any convincing system of musical theorizing must settle once and for ever the question as to how far the physical excitements of music can influence our minds apart from æsthetics. Some might urge that music has no substance except in æsthetics. But this is obviously unsound argument. To take a concrete example: the mind of a man who goes to a concert to hear the 'Siegfried Idyll' is vastly different from that of his neighbour who attends a reproduction of, say, Bizet's 'Carmen.' The former goes deliberately from æsthetic motives, fully prepared not only to hear with all his ears, but to read a part of his own personality into Wagner's music. In reality this individual is as important a part of the proceedings as a violoncellist or an oboe player, for the music was intended to be listened to as well as played. On the other hand the man who visits 'Carmen' has no such interest in the music. He merely regards it as a pleasing adjunct to the stabbing and kissing. It is very evident that he does not concentrate his mind upon the music, or he would resent the presence of the drama and spectacle which divert his attention.

But it is not only in the opera-house that these phenomena can be observed. Music is welcome at every kind of social function. The astute hotel-keeper does not disdain the services of a string band. The justices entering the courts of assize do so to the flourish of trumpets. The politician, after some dubious election work, will wish his triumph to be further impressed upon the masses by a brass band. At theatres, exhibitions, and the like we see the indispensable 'orchestra.' And we might extend the list indefinitely to prove that wherever dynamic excitement is wanted, or whenever it is necessary to raise the emotions of a large body of people, music is always called in to play a secondary but highly important rôle. Wherever the masses congregate, there is music welcome, always with this curious proviso: that the mind shall not be asked to concentrate its attention upon the sounds. The latter must imperatively occupy a subordinate position to the politics, drama, pictures, or the mastications of the moment.

These remarkable aspects of music cannot be adequately dealt with by Schopenhauer's system of philosophy. If we tear away æsthetics from music we shall still have a substantial natural phenomenon which is capable of great influence upon the human mind. But this matter has been quietly boycotted by every thinker except Darwin, and even if the theorist of the future does not accept all the Darwinian conclusions, they will be found to be the only possible grounds upon which we can construct a musical metaphysics which shall cover the complete facts. If we persist in abandoning the physiological and biological elements we shall ultimately flounder in the quicksands of transcendentalism. We can see how perilous this course is by studying Schopenhauer's theory of music, always remembering that Schopenhauer was only half a transcendental, and moreover, one who could express himself with a clearness and directness unknown to his fellow-writers. Secret-necessities, things-in-themselves, and inner-significances will not help us.

Was it not César Franck who said that Kant was 'really very amusing'?

Church and Organ Music.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

III.—OF PASTORS AND MASTERS.

The bad old days when it was almost taken for granted that organist and vicar should live in a state of more or less desultory warfare have happily gone, and are never likely to return. Still, from time to time ecclesiastical and musical journals contain bursts of querulous correspondence, showing that difficulties still crop up. Thus, a Church newspaper will for a few weeks contain letters from clergy complaining of tyrannous organs, organists, and choirs, while anon in a musical journal you will find organists wailing about their high-handed vicars. Unfortunately, this method of airing grievances is of very little use, as the contending parties rarely hear the other side. Organists may or may not be ecclesiastically-minded enough to read the Church Times, but we may be pretty sure that few of the clergy are sufficiently musical to read journals devoted to that art. This 'writing to the papers' is usually futile for another reason. The difficulties in most cases are purely local and personal, and can therefore be fully understood only by those on the spot. Vicar and organist have been described as 'an autocrat and a bundle of nerves,' but commonly there are two autocrats, and in the event of a collision, he who is also a 'bundle of nerves' fares ill. Often the aggrieved organist owes his discomfort to his tactless methods of dealing with those who differ from him. He takes rather a pride in his wrongheadedness. 'See,' he says, in effect, to the creatures of grosser clay with whom he has to deal, 'I am an artist, and of more fiery stuff than your huckster. To prove the which, I will show you how the artist negotiates yonder wall. There is a convenient gate, which I leave for the feeble among you. I myself shall proceed to knock my head against the wall, and you will see it, like those of Jericho, fall down flat.' So saying, he lowers his head, shuts his eyes, and does his part of the programme: the only part which may be written down a success. For his pains, he has a valuable lesson and a bloody coxcomb, both of which he will promptly forget at the next obstacle.

On the whole there is only one course open to an organist who cannot get on with his vicar—he must seek ‘fresh woods and pastures new,’—to vary a well-known quotation. It may be a hardship, but no good work can be done in organizing and maintaining a choir if the musical and ecclesiastical heads are in conflict.

What are the most frequent points of difference? Probably more often than not the matter is one respecting the choice of music, and especially hymn-tunes. It is of course very trying to a musician to be asked to play and teach his choir mission tunes of a tawdry and debased type. His vicar thinks that such tunes make a service attractive to the humbler folk, and no other consideration has much weight with him. In such cases the ‘bundle of nerves’ often comes to grief. He declines to play the tunes, or plays them under protest, and he will complain to his choir, and make satirical references to the clergy in general and his vicar in particular. Having thus undone (in the matter of discipline) the choir work of months, he will write to his pet musical paper on the subject.

The compleat organist does none of these things. He will make an appointment with his vicar, and having got him snugly ensconced in his arm-chair, pipe in mouth, will proceed to administer the word in season. As this question of choice of music is just now very much in the air, I propose to go into it rather more fully than the title of this article warrants. It is, as I said above, one of the most frequent causes of friction between organist and vicar. It may be useful to summarise a few quite simple and obvious arguments on the organist’s side, which are not so often brought before the clergy as they should be. I shall consider the question principally in relation to hymn-tunes. Mutatis mutandis, what follows applies to all other poor Church music.

The compleat organist meeting his vicar, and the pipe of peace having been produced, the proceedings will run on the following lines.

C.O.—‘My dear Vicar, you are so accustomed to deal faithfully with your flock, that I hope you will allow one who, though an official, is still one of them, to do the like with you. We are at cross purposes over the use of mission and other unworthy types of hymn-tunes. I am going to put before you the musical side of the question, that being the only one on which I have the right to speak. I object to these tunes, as I would to shoddy anthems or services, not because I or the choir dislike them, but simply on the ground of their not being good enough for use in Church.’

V.—‘But that’s just the point! I don’t want elaborate music. I want something simple and bright, so that the service shall be hearty and go with a swing.’

C.O.—‘There you follow the bulk of the cloth in supposing that good music is necessarily elaborate. Organists who are keen on the improvement in Church music are trying to hammer into the heads of all concerned the fact that good music may be quite simple, and the simple quite good. There is more than one kind of simplicity,—there is that of the genius, and that of the idiot. So in music you have on one hand an old psalm-tune such as ‘St. Ann’s’ or ‘Dundee,’ and on the other the revivalist type of tune. Both kinds are simple, especially the old tunes, but there can be no question as to which kind is good. What is needed in the Church is the good, simple thing done well,—the good, strong hymn-tune, versicle, and chant well sung. So much for the “elaborate” bogey. Then you demand that the service shall be “hearty” By that you mean it must be loud.’

V.—Well,—er,—I hadn’t—er—aren’t you rather crude?’

C.O.—‘Precisely! It is not a case for subtleties, but facts; and facts are crude. You, as well as ninety-nine per cent. of your fellow-clerics, mean “loud” when you say hearty. Now, your “Nuttall,” conveniently at hand, tells me that “hearty” means “proceeding from the heart; full of heart; with heart; healthy; strong; having a keen appetite”—nothing about “proceeding from the lungs,” you will notice. Good congregational singing, I agree, may well be loud and strong, but the loudness is nothing in itself. It is a mere by-product. To prove to you the absurdity of this fetish of noise, I need only to remind you that of all choral effects, the most thrilling is a real pianissimo by a big choir. So much for your heartiness. Then you demand that a service shall be “bright,” and shall “go with a swing.” Now I do not desire, any more than you do, that the service on its musical side shall hang fire. But I must point out that again much depends upon what we mean by our terms. There is tremendous swing about an old psalm-tune or chorale sung with proper breadth and weight. There is also swing—our less expensive Press is fond of calling it “vim” and “verve”—about most of our popular music-hall songs. Have you ever heard “I’m one of the boys” sung by a crowd? If not, you have missed a good example of brightness and swing of the latter kind. But you will not want that particular variety in Church. The other kind is much less obvious and, like most good things, improves on acquaintance. In this matter of “brightness and swing” I am going to risk your anger by pointing out that we do not find in the clergy as a body any great anxiety about making their part of the service conspicuous for these qualities. Instead, we have the too often slovenly reading of the lessons and prayers, and careless intoning; and as for the pulpit part, I have even known, and that frequently, one cleric to be overtaken, like Bully Bottom, with “an exposition of sleep” while one of his colleagues had been preaching! A clerical demand for “brightness and swing” is likely to come home to roost in many churches!

‘Coming now to the actual matter in dispute—mission hymns—let me put before you a few points. You have asked me to include some of them because a certain percentage of the congregation will like them. Most of our other hymns, you say, are too severe, though you admit their excellence. Now, I am going to reply by making a few suggestions. We are justly proud of our beautiful parish Church, but I have long felt that many of the poorer people of our district do not fully appreciate its architectural excellences. How should they? Fine architecture, especially ecclesiastical, repels, rather than attracts, the uneducated mind. It is too severe, too much outside their everyday experience. Take them to the Hipposeum or some other mammoth place of amusement, and they will feel quite at home, and will remark on the beauty of the building. If you canvassed your congregation, I fancy you would find that to seventy-five per cent. the Hipposeum, as a mere building, gave more pleasure than our Church. Then why not make such structural alterations as shall bring our grand Norman pile into line with popular taste? This argument, if it errs at all, does so on the side of mercy, for the Hipposeum is a good building for its purpose and of its kind, whereas the hymn-tunes on which you set such store are bad both in kind and quality. Their use is as much an offence to the musician as the painting of our beautiful oak choir-stalls with stripes of red, white, and blue would be to you. Yet I doubt not that many of the less educated members of our congregation would think the carving vastly improved with some such scheme of decoration. You would quote in vain the line about "painting the lily." They prefer it painted, regarding it as a tame and chilling bloom otherwise. When I find you decorating the Church to suit their taste, you will hear no protest from me in the matter of hymn-tunes. I think I may safely promise that!

V.—But who is to decide that these tunes are bad? Surely it is a matter of taste, about which there can be no argument.

C.O.—I grant that it is not always an easy thing to decide, especially in the case of examples that hover near the border line. But how do we decide in other arts? In a dispute as to what constitutes a good book, you will consider the opinion of a dozen literary men of standing worth that of ten times the number of the ordinary reading public. Nor, in the matter of pictures, do you hang on the walls of your Church or vicarage crude oleographs or cheap prints such as you find in the poorer homes of your parish. Very few of your parishioners would thank you so much for a beautiful etching as for a highly-coloured print in which the bluest of policemen and the reddest of soldiers are seen ogling the most apple-cheeked of housemaids. Most educated people are quite clear as to the difference between the good and bad in literary and pictorial art. In music, the distinction is equally clear to all who have received a musical education worth the name. They, surely, should be arbiters enough for you. Do you realise, too, that music has its grammar—a code of rules as definite in most cases as those governing language? You would be horrified if I suggested that the choir should sing a hymn, the first lines of which ran:

"I is a awful sinner,
And you be 'ust the same."

You would point out that while the lines contained a statement about which there could be no dispute, the grammar was so hopeless as to render the hymn unfit for use, and I should agree with you. Do you know that most hymn-tunes of the popular type contain breaches of musical grammar every whit as excruciating to a musician as the above lines are to you? I open one of these books (the "Mirfield" Mission Hymn Book) and find this progression:

never argue with these critics from the nave. Argument is impossible, because the common ground on which the disputants can meet is the merest pinpoint in area. He will listen with the courtesy due to one who perhaps subscribes a half-guinea towards his salary, and when the other (a successful business man, let us say) has finished, he will quite pleasantly remark, 'Anything in your suggestion that is worthy consideration shall have it, I promise you. In return, I propose calling at your office to-morrow to give you my views on book-keeping or some other matter connected with your business. I feel sure there must be many points on which a musician can suggest improvements.' The discussion will end, at once, in quite a friendly way, and there are not likely to be any more criticisms from that quarter. At the same time, while the organist must have the courage of his opinions, and maintain the dignity of his office, there are certain matters in which he should not merely welcome criticism and suggestions, but even ask for them. From his position at the console, it often happens that he is the least able of all present to hear the effect he is producing. There are in every congregation at least a few people whose musical knowledge and taste are sufficient to make their opinion of value, and the wise organist will from time to time seek their advice on such matters as balance between organ and choir. Without some periodical check of this kind, he will almost certainly drift into using too much organ in accompanying.

Nothing will test the organist's tact more than an attempt to reform the musical arrangements in a parish where the standard has been low. He must make haste slowly, compromising here, tacking there, but all the while making a little headway. He must not expect his choir and congregation to arrive at one bound at a standard of taste that he himself has arrived at only after long training. This blunder is often made. People can be no more dragooned into refinement than into righteousness. Wherefore let the organist go delicately to work in superseding a favourite hymn-tune, no matter how superior the new one may be. Nothing rouses the man in the pew more than such a change. A law-abiding citizen, a mild man all the week, becomes a very Berserker on the Sunday if you defraud him of a tune he has sung from boyhood. He will not care how bad it was, or how good the new one is. Such changes must come, but the tactful organist will find a way to bring them about with a minimum of annoyance all round. In such a case as the one just mentioned, for example, the solution is found in the alternate use, for a time, of both old and new tunes. The excellences of the new will have a chance to make their appeal, and the comparison between the two will inevitably end in the majority of the congregation preferring the better. In these and many kindred difficulties, the organist will save himself unlimited worry and unpleasantness if he will constantly try to get the point of view of the congregation. He will do his work better, and in the long run get his own way oftener. To attempt a reform at one fell swoop is as mad a proceeding as a cricketer's attempt to score a century in his first few overs. In building up a choir, or founding a good tradition, it is the long game that pays.

Sunday, October 26, was a busy day with Nonconformist choirs at Northampton, no fewer than four holding festival. College Street Baptist gave Hiller's 'Song of Victory'; Mount Pleasant, the second part of 'Elijah'; and at Primrose Hill Congregational Mendelssohn's '42nd Psalm' was the principal item in a scheme which also included works by Wagner and Elgar.

NOTES ON SOME INTERESTING ORGANS AT MAGDEBURG.

BY ERNEST E. ADCOCK.

(Concluded from November number, p. 730.)

3.—ST. JAMES'S CHURCH.

The Church of St. James is, next to the Cathedral, the largest in Magdeburg, being twelve feet longer and two feet wider than St. John's, and moreover it boasts of a tower 205 feet in height. In 1550, in a small inter-state war, when Moritz of Saxony bombarded the town with three small cannon, this building suffered (as also did the Cathedral and other churches), and traces of the damage are still visible, and are pointed out to visitors. It was on that occasion that the old organ was destroyed, and on August 3, 1568, a new one, built by Hans Bockelmann, of Hamburg, was used for the first time.

A heavy thunderstorm in 1613 did much harm to both church and organ, and the lightning scorched some of the pipes of the latter and melted others.

Then came the trouble of 1631, but the destruction wrought upon the edifice does not seem to have been quite so complete as in the case of St. John's, for we read that the walls, arches, &c., were left standing in a fair state of preservation. Nevertheless the organ was totally destroyed. It took some years for the church to recover from such a blow as this, and it was not until 1659 that a small organ built by George Schuler was set up.

In 1678 a larger one was commenced by Herbst, of Halberstadt, but he kept the work hanging about so long, and was so awkward a man to deal with, that the church authorities, who had given him every chance, at length lost patience, took the contract from him, and awarded it to Schnitger. The instrument was completed in 1698, and had twelve stops on the Ober manual, seven on the Brust, twelve on the Hinter, and a Pedal of thirteen stops. The case which enclosed this organ still does duty, and is almost as fine as that in St. John's Church; but the instrument lacks a Ruck-positiv or Choir organ case, and in 1844 was unfortunately liberally picked out with gold.

Various additions and improvements were carried out from time to time, but, roughly speaking, Schnitger's work stood for 150 years. Among the additions was a 32-ft. Posaune supplied in 1741 by an organ-builder named Trautmann.

Finally the instrument was rebuilt and enlarged by Reubke in 1853, and up to 1909 still remained much as he left it, and, unless it has since been rebuilt, still retains the old-fashioned stop-jambs at right angles to the player, with the stops arranged in vertical rows.

The following is the specification :

4.—THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY GHOST.

This is the smallest of the parish churches of Magdeburg, and outwardly the least prepossessing. It shared the same fate as the other churches in 1631, and was rebuilt after the lapse of some years. An organ was also provided, but nothing is known of its builder. It is certain, however, that there must have been one, for Schnitger incorporated seven or eight of its stops into a two-manual organ which he contracted to build in 1694. This was completed in 1698, and had twenty-six speaking stops.

Joachim Wagner, the famous organ-builder, of Berlin, received a commission in 1737 to build a larger instrument of forty-five speaking stops on three manuals and pedal, which he completed in 1740. It is from this time that the present case dates. It is a very ornate affair, with a large number of show-pipes, but, being of a later period, it is more debased in style, and cannot be compared with those in the churches of St. John and St. James. Nevertheless it presents a most imposing front, and is surmounted in the centre by a glittering golden sun, while in other parts are the usual cherubs and angels. The whole is richly decorated in white and gold.

Trouble, caused by the bellows becoming worm-eaten, had to be rectified in 1790, and repairs were also effected in 1837 by Hamann, and in 1862 by Böttcher.

At length, in 1873, a complete rebuilding became an absolute necessity, and the church authorities set about it in earnest. Tenders were solicited from Böttcher and Reubke, and the former was successful in obtaining the commission to build what amounted to almost a new organ. Eight stops only were used from the old instrument, and Barker's lever pneumatic was applied to Manual I. to make the touch a little lighter. The organ was dedicated on April 6, 1876, since which date only slight alterations have been made by Rover. The specification is subjoined:

There are, of course, numerous other interesting churches and organs at Magdeburg, but space forbids anything but a brief mention of one or two of them. St. Katherine's could boast of a fine organ case in the Baroque style up to 1875, when it was ruthlessly swept away, and another in the Gothic style substituted. The writer is unable to say what this Gothic case was like, but the probability is that it was not so good as the one it displaced. Praetorius mentions an early organ in this church, for which in 1706 Schnitger built a new instrument of two manuals and pedal. A perusal of these notes will force upon readers the truth of the old adage 'It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good,' for certainly the 1631 disaster brought plenty of grist to Schnitger's mill.

In 1875 Reubke erected a new organ which possessed forty-seven speaking stops, and in 1904 this was rebuilt and thoroughly modernised by Furtwangler & Hammer, of Hanover. Slight alterations were made in its specification, electric blowing installed, and the 1875 case had in its turn to make way for another one.

The Walloon Reformed Church contains a fine organ case, dating from 1757, which is decorated, like that in the Church of the Holy Ghost, in white and gold. It originally contained an organ built by Philip William Grunberg, which was a two-manual instrument. After having been repaired at various times, the pipe-work and mechanism were at length quite worn out, and in 1904 Sauer erected a magnificent organ with fourteen stops on Manual I., thirteen on Manual II., twelve on Manual III., and eleven on the Pedal, as well as numerous up-to-date accessories.

It seems rather difficult to make an end before a more complete exhaustion of one's information has been arrived at, but probably enough has been written, not only to arouse the interest of organ enthusiasts, but also, perchance, to guide their footsteps should they ever be fortunate enough to find themselves in Magdeburg or its near vicinity.

Under the title 'The English Carol Book,' Messrs. Mowbray have just issued a volume of carols, collected, arranged and composed by Mr. Martin Shaw, the words being edited by Dr. Percy Dearmer. The collection consists mainly of traditional English Carols, the religious folk-song of our people, and includes also some translations of foreign carols, and a few modern works by Mr. Selwyn Image and others.

The Oxford University Press have issued their Kalendar of Hymns A. & M. for the year 1914—a little book which those responsible for the choice of hymns will find useful. The Kalendar also contains a Table of Lessons, Proper Psalms, &c.

* Stops used by Böttcher from Wagner's organ.

The Syllabus of the fifth session of the Liverpool and District Organists' and Choirmasters' Association should provide some interesting and useful gatherings. The monthly lectures are on 'The organ in the making' (Mr. W. M. Rushworth); 'Some aspects of the music of Brahms' (Dr. A. W. Pollitt); 'Church Music' (Mr. C. W. Bridson); 'Liverpool Cathedral' (Rev. C. Harris); 'Accompaniments and accompanist' (Mr. T. Halsall); 'Practical Plainchant to British words' (Mr. Royle Shore); and a discussion on Mr. Bates's 'Voice-training for children.'

The Henry Smart centenary seems to have been generally well observed, most organists having made a point of drawing on the composer's work on his birthday, Sunday, October 26. Numerous reports have reached us from all parts of the country.

The Edinburgh Society of Organists held their first meeting in Broughton Place Church Hall on October 28, when Prof. Niecks, the honorary president, delivered a lecture on 'Expression and phrasing in organ-playing,' with illustrations by Dr. W. B. Ross.

A demonstration was given in St. Andrew's Church, Mottingham, on Saturday, October 18, by the Rev. J. Eckersley, on the subject of 'Psalm-chanting by an improved method,' in which regard is paid to the varying sentiments, refrains, dramatic utterances, and parallelisms of the Hebrew poetry, with a view to avoiding gabbling and false accentuation, and providing such chants as would encourage congregational singing. Illustrations were sung by the choir of St. Andrew's Church. There was a good representative audience, largely composed of organists, and the opinion was freely expressed that Mr. Eckersley had done much to simplify and improve the rendering of psalms. All said and done, however, the avoidance of gabbling depends most of all upon the choirmaster. A method of chanting, like a book on voice-production or pianoforte playing, or any other branch of pedagogy, is just as successful as the teacher allows it to be. There are no short cuts or royal roads.

The Leytonstone Church Choir Association completed their third year by assisting at evensong on All Saints' Eve at the Church of St. John the Baptist, Leytonstone—the sixth service in which they have taken part. There were 120 voices, drawn from four choirs, and the music included Noble's A minor setting of the Canticles, Stanford's 'And I saw another Angel,' and Handel's 'Then round about the starry Throne.'

The Loughton Choral and Orchestral Society have taken for their twenty-third season's work Spohr's 'Last Judgment,' and the concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust,' together with smaller choral numbers.

With recital organists devoting whole programmes to transcriptions from Wagner, Tchaikovsky, &c., it is well that pure organ music should occasionally be given its due. A series of five recitals of organ music of the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries was given in October at St. Stephen's, Walbrook, by Mr. F. W. Holloway. The programmes covered a wide range, and included nothing but music actually written for the instrument. The series contained some admirable specimens of English work by the older composers, such as Wesley, Walmisley, Thomas Adams, John Stanley, and Felton.

An interesting recital of music for organ in combination with various other instruments was given in Park Chapel, Crouch End, on November 13. The performers were Mr. Eugene Meier (violin), Mr. Walter Hobday (violinello), Mr. Harry Stubbs (organ), and Mr. F. Cunningham Woods (pianoforte). Miss Dilys Jones sang, and Mr. Henry R. Bird accompanied.

On November 1, the Bishop of Liverpool dedicated the new organ at Knowsley. The instrument, a three-manual with thirty-seven speaking stops, was built by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper, and was shown to advantage in a recital by Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson.

Reviews.

Longing. For S.A.T.B. By Haydn Keeton.
Sweet day, so cool, so bright. For S.A.T.B. By David Stephen.
Perfection (Sinfonia domestica chorals). For S.S.A.A.-
 T.T.B.B. By A. C. Mackenzie.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Dr. Keeton's part-song is a short and very agreeable essay. The part-writing is interesting and grateful, and well within the powers of a choir of quite modest attainments.

Mr. Stephens's setting of George Herbert's well-known lines demands more of the performers, by reason of some sudden key-changes. The rhythm also is less straightforward. These difficulties surmounted, the little work should be effective.

Advanced choral Societies in need of a humorous work wherewith to recreate themselves after more severe labours will find what they want in Sir Alexander Mackenzie's Choral Domestic Symphony. The first part of the work is for T.T.B.B.; the second for S.S.A.A.; and the third for S.A.T.B. with occasional division of parts. We quote the words of the first section, in order to give an idea of the joke:

'I hail the perfect woman,
 Perfect in every sense,
 With beauteous form to grace allied,
 And fortune quite immense.
 No curtain lecture doth she read,
 When night's dim hour has come.'
 'If so,' my loving wife exclaimed,
 'Poor dear! she must be dumb!'

'I love a perfect woman
 And she, I know, loves me.
 Who praises all her friends' attire,
 Though dowdy they may be.
 A Paris hat of ancient style,
 She views with glances kind.'
 You can't mean me,' my wife replied,
 'For surely I'm not blind.'

The female choir then enters (irato) with a similar satire directed at the men, after which both parties join in sympathising with the inhabitants of Mars, where it is presumed these perfect men and women are to be found. There is some capital fun in the writing of this section, notably in the time-honoured sequence of descending 7ths (stridente) at the words 'And bore each other all day long.' The music throughout is tuneful, and would present no difficulty to a well-equipped choir.

Musiciens Anglais Contemporains. Par R. A. Streatfeild.
 Traduction française de Louis Pennequin.

[Paris: Editions du temps présent.]

Rare indeed are the signs that British music rouses any interest among foreign musicians as a thing to be sought out and studied. A sign is now given, in the form of this translation of Mr. Streatfeild's essays, that there is a demand in France, or at least Paris, to learn about our composers and their works—if one may credit the publisher with a knowledge of his market. Mr. Streatfeild deals with the life and works of Elgar, Dr. Ethel Smyth, Delius, Parry, Stanford, and Bantock, and shows exhaustive knowledge of his subject in each case. He is no mechanical eulogist, for while he gives free rein to his enthusiasms he does not shirk criticism. The article on Elgar was printed in De Nieuwe Gids (in English) and in Le revue du temps présent in 1912, and an extensive quotation was made in our issue for June, 1912.

Of the Father's love begotten. Anthem for Christmas. By Edward C. Bairstow.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Dr. Bairstow has taken the ancient melody, 'Corde natus,' as a basis for his work, which is practically a set of choral variations. The words are from the well-known hymn of Prudentius (A. & M. 56, E. H. 613). The first verse is given to the tenors and basses in unison, with an organ part containing some effective bits of canon. Verse 2 (Andante Pastorale) is for trebles, a charming melody in $\frac{3}{4}$ time, with the hymn-tune used as a bass. A four-part section mainly unaccompanied follows, while the final chorus (Allegro con spirito) gives us five pages of admirable polyphonic treatment of the Canto fermo. While thoroughly modern in style, the work has an unmistakably ecclesiastical flavour, both by reason of the theme and its treatment. It is a convincing proof, if any be needed, that it is possible to write good church music without adopting the style of a bygone age.

Funerale for Harmonium. By Sigfrid Karg-Elert.

[Carl Simon: Berlin.]

A simple little tribute to the memory of Prof. August Reinhard (d. November, 1912). Personal interest is supplied by a quotation from a work by the deceased composer. We note that the dreadful Lowell-Mason tune to 'Nearer, my God, to Thee,' on which Herr Karg-Elert recently wrote a symphonic organ piece, seems to have taken his fancy. Anyway, he had by no means finished with the tune, for here we find him using a strain from it by way of final cadence. It is the very last tune, we should have thought, to appeal to one with the magnificent chorales of Germany in his blood. We hope he does not think it is typical of English hymnody!

Legend. (Original Compositions for the Organ (New series), No. 15.) By Harvey Grace.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Harvey Grace's 'Legend' has the rare value of being original without affectation or eccentricity, and of capturing the attention with a mood of simplicity. It opens with a tune that suggests an old-world carol. This is continued and treated with simple, gently-moving harmonies, and gives way to a more decided theme in common time that seems to introduce a new scene or character to the unfolding of the 'Legend.' The new matter is carried to a climax on a more emotional note, and suddenly gives way to the opening theme, lento ponderoso, with the bass in canon at the octave. The carol tune remains in the ascendant, while the music becomes quieter, until the end. There is no lack of chromatic harmony, but it clings to the key of the piece—D minor. Within the limits of this simple form Mr. Grace expresses a good deal that is worth expressing.

Nine Folk-Song Carols. Collected and arranged by Cecil J. Sharp. (Novello's School Songs, Book 245.)

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The collection of folk-songs, of which this set of carols forms a new and interesting part, grows steadily under the fostering care of Mr. Cecil J. Sharp. The first of the set, 'King Herod and the Cock' (Worcestershire), with its quaint words and robust tune, is likely to attract. A Warwickshire ditty, 'The moon shines bright,' the music of which is in a minor mode with a flat seventh, strikes us as being one of the most beautiful melodies in the book. A Gloucestershire version of 'The holly and the ivy' has a lively tune in which the accented pulse of every bar but one has two quavers. Another swinging tune from the same county, 'Come, all you true good Christians,' although newly-found, gives us the impression that we have heard it before. 'Come, all you worthy gentlemen' has a distinctive feature in two leaps from the leading-note up to the mediant. 'As I sat on a sunny bank,' a version of the 'Three Ships' tradition, is a six-eight melody that could be picked up in a few minutes. 'The Virgin unspotted' is a peculiarly graceful tune in triple time. 'Sons of Levi' (Kent) is a broad, flowing tune which, like the last in the set, 'Wassail Songs,' would be very effective with a large choir or congregation, but the words of the latter are not so well adapted to ecclesiastical use. All the carols are adorned with accompaniments that are musically attractive without distracting attention from the melodies. Of course these accompaniments are in the nature of decorative redundancies that may be used at option.

Correspondence.

VOCAL EXERCISES BY PORPORA.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—In reply to Mr. Hadson's query regarding the above, it should be remembered that a footnote on page 105 of Lunn's 'Philosophy of Voice,' eighth edition, states that they are 'to be had from the author.' Charles Lunn died, I might parenthetically observe, in the same year as Garcia, the centenarian, namely, 1906. Doubtless Mr. Lunn's son, of Cleeve Prior, Evesham, would give the desired information.

Personally I should be pleased to show anyone the old copy I possess of the original exercises which the author gave me whilst studying the same with him. They contain no accompaniment, for Lunn, whilst referring to the exercises in question, says: 'Use no accompaniment, plunge into the sea of sound, it is only a cripple who wants crutches.'

In a mutilated form, the exercises were republished by Reynolds & Co., Berners Street, W., a short time ago (but with accompaniments) in connection with Lunn's last book called 'The Voice,' published by subscription, as he said, in order 'To keep the method I have compiled exclusively in the hands of my pupils.' This may account for the scarceness of the work in question.—Yours faithfully,

GEORGE R. CEILEY.

AN OMISSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I notice in the article on Mr. Frederick Corder in your last issue, that in giving particulars of his career no mention is made of his long connection with Trinity College of Music.

May I be permitted to contribute to the completeness of the article by stating that Mr. Corder was appointed Professor of the Pianoforte in 1886 and Conductor of the Orchestra from 1890 to 1897, when he relinquished both offices.

I may also add that the College had the benefit for many years of Mr. Corder's services as an examiner for the Higher Examinations.—Yours faithfully,

DIRECTOR OF STUDIES,
Trinity College of Music.

Obituary.

We regret to announce the following deaths:

MADAME MATHILDE MARCHESI, on November 17, at the residence of her daughter, Madame Blanche Marchesi, 16, Greville Place, Kilburn Priory, London, N.W. She was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main on November 26, 1826, and was thus, at her death, in her eighty-eighth year. Her father was I. Friedrich Graumann, a merchant, and her mother came of a good family at Frankfort. She displayed great vocal talent in her youth, and was for some time a pupil of Otto Nicolai, who made her an offer of marriage which she declined. After some vicissitudes she became a pupil of Manuel Garcia, and soon began to be in great demand as a concert-singer. In 1852 she married Salvatore Marchesi, a celebrated baritone singer. He died at Paris on February 20, 1908, at the age of eighty-six. From 1854 to 1861 Madame Marchesi was professor of singing at the Vienna Conservatoire, and in the latter year she settled at Paris and established a great teaching connection. Rossini was one of her personal friends, and he was a great admirer of her method of teaching. In 1864 she sang with a touring party in this country, and in 1865 she became a professor in the Cologne Conservatoire, a post she retained for three years, afterwards returning to the Vienna Conservatoire. This appointment she retained until 1878, when she established an independent school. Her pupils included Ilma de' Murska, and many others known to fame. She settled again at Paris in 1882, where she remained and taught for many years. Her daughter Blanche has followed the profession of singing and has earned considerable fame as a performer and teacher.

CARL WILHELM ADOLPHE SCHLOESSER, at Great Bookham, on November 10. He was born at Darmstadt, on February 1, 1830. His father, Louis Schloesser, was a violinist, conductor, and composer. Adolphe (the name by which he was known) came to England in 1854, and soon after was appointed to a professorship of the pianoforte at the Royal Academy of Music. In this important post he gained much esteem. He retired in 1903. He was a warm advocate of Schumann's music at a period when that composer was not much appreciated.

GEORGE ARTHUR CLINTON, suddenly, on October 24, in the sixty-third year of his age. He was professor of the clarinet at the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall, the Royal Academy of Music, and Trinity College, London. He was for many years solo clarinet in H.M. Queen Victoria's Private Band, and principal clarinet in the Crystal Palace Orchestra, and in the orchestras of the Philharmonic Society and the Royal Choral Society.

ARTHUR DUKE COLERIDGE, on October 29, in his eighty-third year. He was an enthusiastic musical amateur. The first performance in England of Bach's Mass in B minor was owing to his influence and exertions. He founded the Bach Choir, and he was one of the founders of the Mendelssohn Scholarship.

FRESH LIGHT ON OLD ENGLISH AIRS.

By W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

'THE BRITISH GRENADIERS.'

Much ingenuity has been expended in tracing the original source of the tune of 'The British Grenadiers.' Some have imagined that the present air is an evolution of 'All you that love good fellows' (also known as 'The London Prentice'), while others would have us believe that it is a variant of 'Sir Edward Nowell's Delight.' And not a few have ventured to describe it as another form of 'Grace Nugent,' composed by Turlough O'Carolan about the year 1710.

As to the words of the song, Chappell is inclined to date them as written circa 1688 (the Grenadiers were first formed in 1678), but probably they only go back to 1704 or 1705. Internal evidence is quite sufficient to justify us assigning the latter date, as the 'hand grenades' alluded to in the third verse fell into disuse about the year 1710. Chappell, in his 'Collection of National English Airs' (1838), prints a version of the song which he regards as 'about eighty years old,' but I have good reason to believe that his copy was not older than 1770. Certain it is that his version has been taken from a copy of about that date, or probably of 1775, and it has been somewhat tinkered, probably by Chappell himself, who has also introduced an additional verse. I hereto subjoin in parallel columns an early form of the words as printed in 1760 or thereabouts, and Chappell's version.

VERSION OF 1760.

Some talk of Alexander and some of Hercules,
Of Conon and Lysander, and some Miltiades;
But of all the world's brave heroes there is none that can compare
row row, to the British Grenadiers.

Chorus: But of all the world's, &c.

None of those ancient heroes e'er saw a cannon ball,
Or knew the force of Powder
to slay their foes withal;
But our brave boys do know it, and banish all their fears,
With a tow row, row row,
row row, the British Grenadiers.

Chorus: But our brave
boys, &c.

(3)

When'er we are commanded to storm the Palisades,
Our Leaders march with Fuseses and we with hand
Granades;
We throw them from the Glacis about our enemies' ears,
row row, the British Grenadiers.

Chorus: We throw them, &c.

(1)

Some talk of Alexander and
some of Hercules,
Of Hector and Lysander, and such great names as these;
But of all the world's brave heroes there's none that can compare,
row row, to the British Grenadiers.

Chorus: But of all the world's, &c.

Those heroes of antiquity ne'er saw a cannon ball,
Or knew the force of powder
to slay their foes withal;
But our brave boys do know
it, and banish all their fears,
Sing tow row, row row, row row, to the British Grenadiers.

Chorus: But our brave
boys, &c.

(3)

When'er we are commanded
to storm the palisades,
Our leaders march with fuseses, and we with hand grenades;
We throw them from the glacis about the French-men's ears,
Sing tow row, row row,
row row, the British Grenadiers.

Chorus: We throw them, &c.

(4)

The god of war was pleased, and great Bellona smiles,
To see these noble Heroes of our own British Isles;
And all the Gods celestial descending from their spheres,
Beheld with admiration the British Grenadiers.

Chorus: And all the Gods, &c.

(5)

Then let us crown a Bumper and drink a health to those
Who carry caps and Pouches, that wear the louped cloaths.
May they and their Commanders live happy all their Years,
row row, the British Grenadiers.

Chorus. May they and their Commanders, &c.

(4)

Then Jove the god of thunder, and Mars the god of war, Brave Neptune with his trident, Apollo in his car;
And all the gods celestial descending from their spheres,
Behold with admiration the British Grenadiers.

Chorus: And all the gods, &c.

(5)

And when the siege is over,
we to the town repair,
The townsmen cry Hurra, boys, here comes a Grenadier.
Here come the Grenadiers, my boys, who know no doubts or fears,
Then sing tow row, row row, row row, the British Grenadiers.

Chorus. Here comes the,

(6)

Then let us fill a bumper, and drink a health to those Who carry caps and pouches and wear the louped clothes.
May they and their commanders live happy all
their years.

With a tow row, row
British Grenadiers.

Chorus. May they, &c.

So much for the words. And now as to the tune. Mr. Kidson rightly says that early copies of the melody are not common, and he further states in the new edition of Grove's 'Dictionary' (vol. v., p. 620) that the earliest copy he has seen is from 'about the year 1735 or 1740.' I have not been fortunate enough to meet with a copy of this early date, and I scarcely think it likely that a music sheet of so early a date can be verified; but I possess a half music sheet, with the music and words dated circa 1760. However, it is very remarkable that Mr. Kidson, in 'The Minstrelsy of England' (1901), prints a setting of 'The British Grenadiers,' purporting to be taken from 'one of these half sheets of music of about the year 1750,' and yet which is totally unlike the settings of 1760-1790; in fact, which is a completely modern setting. As I write I have before me the printed setting of 1760, and the setting to be found in the 'Musical Miscellany' (1786), both of which are almost identical, and I herewith subjoin the melody of 1760, followed by the modern* setting as given by Mr. Kidson.

ENC. 1.

* By 'modern setting,' I mean the version which came into vogue about the year 1835.

THE BRITISH GRENADIERS (1901).

EX. 2.

There still remains to be considered the source of the tune. Chappell, in 1838, stated that 'The British Grenadiers' bore a strong resemblance to 'Sir Edward Nowell's Delight,' and that it was also very like 'The London' Prentice' or 'All you that love good fellows.' He adds that the latter melody must have been known 'before the year 1628,' as in that year a ballad was printed to the tune of 'All you that love good fellows.' Other writers pretend to see the source of the tune in 'Nancie,' to be found in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book,' arranged by Thomas Morley, but the resemblance only extends to the first two bars. Mr. Kidson quotes from Chappell as to the tune of 'Sir Edward Nowell's Delight' appearing in a Dutch book in 1634, but Mr. Duntan, in his 'Minstrelsy of England' (1906), states that the tune was printed at Amsterdam, 'in Bellerophon, in 1622.' Be that as it may, no serious student can at all equate the melody of 'The British Grenadiers' as derived from 'Nancie,' or from 'Sir Edward Nowell's Delight' or yet from 'All you that love good fellows.'

Quite recently a friend drew my attention to a tune which he considered may have been the original of 'The British Grenadiers.' This tune is entitled 'Dr. Faustus' Tumblers,' and it was printed by Playford in his 'Dancing Master,' vol. iii., in 1726-27. At first sight there seems a considerable resemblance, but on examination the identity is by no means clear. For the sake of comparison I give the melody of 'Dr. Faustus' Tumblers.'

'DR. FAUSTUS' TUMBLERS' (PLAYFORD 1726).

EX. 3.

There remains but one more source, and this, in my opinion, is the undoubted tune which was borrowed by the English, and subsequently adapted to the song of 'The British Grenadiers.' Without further beating about the bush, I have no hesitation in tracing the air to 'Wilhelmus van Nassouwe' (1581), which, in turn, was borrowed from a song of derision on the siege of Chartres in 1568, entitled 'O la folle entreprise du Prince de Condé.' Prof. Enschedé says that the song was originally written in French, but was translated into Dutch by Marnix, in 1572, and hence has been regarded as of Dutch provenance. As a proof of the popularity of the French song, 'O la folle entreprise,' it is found printed in 1570 in a 'Recueil de Chansons Spirituelles,' and again in 'La pieuse alouette avec son tire lire' it is wedded to a hymn in honour of the Blessed Virgin, in 1619. It was adopted as the national anthem of the Netherlands, and was printed in 1581 as 'Wilhelmus van Nassouwe'—its French origin being admitted, as underneath the title is added 'Naar de wijze van Chartres.' I herewith subjoin the old French melody as adapted by the Dutch in 1581, and I feel convinced that the identity of the melody with the older form of 'The British Grenadiers' is too close to be merely accidental.

'WILHELMUS VAN NASSOUWE' (1581).

EX. 4.

It is not at all surprising that the English soldiers under King William III. in his Continental campaign picked up the French tune and made it their own, and of course the deception was completed when the song of 'The British Grenadiers' was adapted to this fine old marching tune. The selfsame process resulted in the English annexation of the French 'Malbrouk s'en va-t-en guerre,' and its conversion into the convivial song of 'For he's a jolly good fellow,' which has been the unrivalled wind-up of social functions in Great Britain and Ireland since 1835. At this date the modern setting of 'The British Grenadiers' came into vogue, superseding the older adaptation of 1704 or 1705. Many other instances could be adduced of English 'borrowings' from French melodies, but these I hope to treat of in a subsequent article.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF COUNTERPOINT.

On November 4 Mr. Frederick Corder read a paper with the above title at the opening meeting of the new session of the Musical Association. He said that one of the best papers on practical subjects that had been read before the Association was that by the late Dr. Sawyer, 'Why do we teach harmony so badly?' which had been the cause of the publication of the two best text-books on harmony the world had yet seen: those of Prout and Macpherson. Harmony was now adequately taught; could the same be said of counterpoint? It was not that the teacher was inadequate. As a teacher of counterpoint for over thirty-five years he (the lecturer) was convinced that our ideas on the subject needed modernising. In teaching languages it used to be the custom to confine the vocabulary and the exercise-sentences to things which were of no practical use to the learner. Why? Nobody knew: it was traditional; that was enough. We were gradually abolishing these absurdities, except in Latin. It was the Caius and Balbus element in counterpoint that worried him. Explain it to the pupil how one might, the sensible musical pupil of to-day had to put a severe strain upon his powers of belief before he could accept such fatuous things as this:

as stepping-stones to a musical career.

Strict counterpoint was no more than an educational fiction, as unreal a language of conviction as Esperanto. If theorists would be sensible and accept it as an imaginary jargon invented to exercise the pupil on the free progression of concord to concord, such a point of view would cause the necessary exercises to acquire a more practical character, and they would perhaps be restrained within reasonable bounds. But it was the assumption, the pretence, that strict counterpoint was a semi-sacred language, like Latin, that everybody must study, yet nobody ever acquire, that enumbed the student. He yielded to no one in his estimation of the educational value of strict counterpoint,—up to a very definite point—but he was just as strong in his conviction that the demands made after that point were altogether foolish and time-wasting. Strict counterpoint of the first species in two parts was an obvious commencement for musical training, and the only pity was that it could not precede elementary harmony. But why must we use those repulsive canti fermi of our ancestors? Chorales would serve the purpose just as well, and would appeal to the student far more. What human being would believe that those rows of fat semibreves were meant for music? They were merely invented to save the teacher trouble. The idea that they would serve equally well for all contrapuntal purposes was a delusion. Could one use a fourth species in the bass against a rising scale? Could one put double counterpoint in the tenth of first species against a canto which went for more than four notes in one direction, or against a canto in a minor key which had a leading-note in it? The learner needed a carefully devised set of subjects suitable for each kind of puzzle that he was set; yet it was only puzzle-work when all was said. In these days we could not afford to make the student waste his time over the study of dead languages. There were so many living facts that he had to assimilate, that unless something was speedily done to modernise the methods and the material of counterpoint, our students would either neglect the study—they pursued it only under protest now—or they would have their spirit crushed.

Each modern treatise had endeavoured to expound its theme more sensibly than the preceding one, and each writer had more or less neglected the spirit for the letter. Every modern book had begun with a perfectly splendid preface that made one feel that here at last was the treatise so long waited for. But the shadow of the public examination was over every man, and he dared not fulfil his noble promise. Whether he declared that counterpoint was the musical method of 'the ancients,' or whether he declared it to be only a means to an end, or whether he believed that salvation lay in trying to write like Palestrina, it all ended in the same hideously unmusical jargon. In that highly interesting collection of examples culled by Dr. Gordon Saunders from the early text-books, the majority of them were appallingly bad from every point of view.

Discussing the points open to improvement, Mr. Corder said that in two-part counterpoint, at any rate in the first species, which was such a valuable preliminary ear-training, the subjects should be rhythmical melodies. One could be as strict as one liked except that one would never make any student believe that the conventional cadence:

was half as satisfactory to the ear as the one to which he was accustomed:

—in which he was perfectly right. In the second species you would never get a really musical pupil to understand why he may not write:

while he may write:

This species should be much more elaborately taught and explained than it was.

Most theorists looked with horror upon semitonal auxiliary notes even when the taking of one of them below the dominant would save an ugly tritone; and although accented passing-notes on the first of a bar were grudgingly conceded as 'allowable,' to use one was infallibly to lose marks in any examination. In fourth species the only thing needful was to draw the student's attention to the fact that rising suspensions—except that of the leading-note, which some forbade—were not of good effect. Suspensions in the bass were very harsh, and it should be explained that an unbroken chain of suspensions in the bass was not in itself a desirable thing in music; it was being done purely as a technical exercise. Every student had to be taught the idiom of fifth species, and rightly regarded it as a useless puerility when he had acquired it. Why should any restriction at all, beyond that of musicality, be placed here? The preceding species taught the mechanism of melody; now let the student apply it according to his own fancy.

In three-part counterpoint the melodic aspect wanted to be emphasised at the expense of the harmonic. With special and really musical subjects all three parts could be advantageously practised in the fifth species. Real three-part writing was as far as ordinary students needed to go; but the unmusical ones, of course, must have something to grind at, and of all the unending and hopeless labours there was nothing like the strict counterpoint of the books in four or more parts. Fourth species in the bass ought not to be practised in four parts. The result was simply miserable. In four parts, too, a dominant $\frac{4}{2}$ chord became indispensable. How else was it possible to end an exercise when the top part walked down four notes to the Tonic? Counterpoint in more than four parts was a sheer waste of time.

Combined counterpoint needed thorough overhauling. The only combinations of any utility were first, second, and third species in three parts, and fifth species in from three parts to as many as one liked, provided rests were used. Double counterpoint in the octave was essential, and canon was most valuable practice if confined to reasonable limits. These were (a) two-part canon in every interval, (b) ditto in a free part, (c) ditto on a chorale or ground. The subjects must always be rhythmical and musically interesting.

If we were content to regard strict counterpoint as a mere puzzle-game, the chief object of which was to teach students to read, then leave it pretty much as it is, but do not turn a mere game into a cult, like golf. If it were claimed that it was intended to endow the student with a technique for polyphony, then it was just three centuries behind the time and it had to be brought up to date. Would it be taught on present lines in the far future? The difficulty was in deciding who should take action. No single individual could; he would not have the power. The Universities could, but they would never agree. Meanwhile musicians had to train pupils on totally different lines according as they desired to become composers or to become organists. Would it be deemed a feasible suggestion that such an independent body as the Musical Association should appoint a kind of Royal Commission to ascertain the private views of experienced teachers, and issue a Report urging the Universities to take definite action? It was the only chance of reform that he could see.

In the discussion which followed the paper, Dr. W. H. Cummings, the chairman, remarked that Mr. Corder's paper was full of thought and suggestion. He himself had never been taught counterpoint; the only book he studied with E. J. Hopkins, his master, was Goss's 'Harmony.' Good music could hardly exist without counterpoint, but it was very doubtful whether it was properly taught or properly understood.

Mr. F. G. Webb thought that a good deal of the wildness of our very talented young composers arose from the excessive restrictions placed on them during their education. They were like boys let out of school. Counterpoint should be considered from a modern standpoint.

Dr. R. R. Terry remarked that the whole secret of counterpoint being out of touch with everything that was musical and artistic was just this: When counterpoint was a living art it followed certain rules; these rules were modal. Now we had the major and minor keys. When rules which only had any sense when applied to modes were transferred to keys, then counterpoint became a hybrid, something which was in touch with neither ancient nor modern. Counterpoint as we understood it had no existence until the 18th century, and our traditions were therefore only those of yesterday. The study of strict counterpoint did not help a person to understand either Palestrina or living works of art.

The November issue of the Three Arts Journal, published at the Three Arts Club, makes good reading. A lecture by Mr. Bernard Shaw upon the economic position of women artists is given verbatim. There is much miscellaneous matter of interest, including notes on current musical events.

RECITING TO MUSIC.

In our last issue (p. 746) we reported a recital of various poems given by Mr. Charles Fry with musical accompaniment. On that occasion Mr. Fry prefaced the programme with some remarks on the history of this form of combined art. After paying a tribute to the memory of his friend the late Clifford Harrison, who excelled as a poet, musician, painter, and reciter, Mr. Fry went on to say that he might claim to be entitled to speak on the subject, as, apart from his Shakespearean work, the greater part of his professional career had been devoted to reciting in works with music.

So far as is generally known, said Mr. Fry, the earliest use of Melodrame—the technical term for the association of speech with music—was made in 1772, when Jean Jacques Rousseau produced, at Lyons, a dramatic piece entitled ‘Pygmalion,’ in which spoken dialogue was interspersed with music (the character of which was clearly indicated by the author), written by a French composer named Coignet. It achieved a great success, and was repeated at Paris in 1775. About the same period, Brandes, a German, adapted as a Melodrame a cantata entitled ‘Ariadne,’ for the use of his wife, an actress who could not sing. The music for this was composed by Georg Benda. Whether Brandes was influenced by Rousseau’s production is not known, but it is evident that the credit of originating the method is due either to Rousseau or Brandes. ‘Ariadne’ also proved successful, and its production was followed by another Melodrame entitled ‘Medea,’ by Gotter, the music in this case also being composed by Benda. These works were known to Mozart, and influenced him in the composition of music for a drama on the subject of ‘Semiramis.’ To instance Mozart’s approval of the method Mr. Fry quoted the following from a letter written by the composer to Von Dalberg, manager of the Mannheim theatre:

With regard to the Monodrame a vocal part is by no means necessary, as not a single note is sung; it is entirely spoken: in short, it is a recitative with instruments, only the actor speaks the words instead of singing them. If you were to hear it, even with the pianoforte, it could not fail to please you; if it were properly performed you would be quite transported. I can answer for this; but it requires a good actor or actress.

There is no record of the performance of this work; but that the master was still favourably impressed with the method is clear, as he employed Melodrame in his opera ‘Zaide.’ We know that Beethoven introduced melodrame in the prison scene in ‘Fidelio’ with great effect, and Weber also employed it in the Incantation scene in ‘Der Freischütz.’

Later, Mendelssohn adopted the device in his ‘Athalie,’ ‘Antigone,’ and ‘Edipus,’ while it was still more prominently and effectively employed by Schumann in his ‘Manfred’; rarely has a more beautiful and touching effect been created than by his accompaniment to the invocation to ‘Astarte.’ Many modern composers have accepted the idea, prominent examples being Liszt’s ‘Lenore,’ Richard Strauss’s ‘Enoch Arden,’ and Grieg’s dramatic setting of ‘Bergliot.’ It was reserved, however, for Sir Alexander Mackenzie to develop the method to the fullest extent in his ‘Dream of Jubal,’ a poem with Music, the words of which were written by the late Joseph Bennett, the eminent critic of the Daily Telegraph, and in the production of which Mr. Fry was associated as reciter. Here about 250 lines of poetry are accompanied throughout by the orchestra, and it is certainly the most remarkable work of the kind ever written. In the music accompanying the recitation, the distinguished composer has given some of the most delicate and beautiful of his creations.

Mr. Fry stated that probably the most prolific writer of musical recitations was Mr. Stanley Hawley, who had, he believed, written music for over fifty poems.

He concluded by saying that he thought he had given sufficient reason to show that the method of associating music with speech had appealed to many of the world’s most eminent composers.

Mr. Herbert E. C. Hill, of Attleborough, has been appointed conductor of the Hingham Choral Society, on the resignation of the Rev. G. Russell.

THE WILLIAM LUDWIG MATINÉE.

A special matinée in aid of the William Ludwig Testimonial Fund will be given at His Majesty’s Theatre on December 8. The artists who have promised to appear are Miss Marie Tempest, Miss Florence Smithson, Mr. H. B. Irving, Mr. Maurice Farkoa, Miss Margaret Cooper, Mr. Barclay Gammon; Mr. Arthur Bouchier and Miss Violet Vanbrugh, in ‘Pearls,’ by Stanley Houghton; Mr. George Grossmith and Miss Kitty Mason, in a Tango; Sir Herbert Tree and Mr. Tom Reynolds in ‘The Van Dyck.’

AN APPRECIATION.

A correspondent writes:

‘All things point to a highly-successful benefit performance at His Majesty’s Theatre, on December 8, in aid of Mr. William Ludwig. It is sad that such a genuine artist, such a magnificent actor, such a man of splendid physique, should be compelled to seek retirement owing to an incurable throat malady; but it is gratifying that in the day of distress so many fellow-artists have come forward and promised whole-hearted support towards the monster programme which will be offered the public on the 8th inst. With characteristic generosity Sir Herbert Tree has granted the use of the theatre, and a strong committee, organized by Mr. T. P. O’Connor, M.P., have been working for some months to ensure a bumper house. It is apropos, therefore, to give a short memoir of the distinguished Irish singer, now forced to relinquish his professional engagements whether on the operatic or the concert stage.

‘William Ludwig—whose family name has always been Ledwidge—is the son of William Ledwidge, of Arran Quay, Dublin, and was born in December, 1847. His father was an excellent amateur musician, and was second tenor in the choir of the Pro-Cathedral, Dublin; being also a capable actor, he took part in the first production on any stage of Boucicault’s ‘Arrah-na-Pogue,’ in the Dublin Theatre Royal, on November 7, 1864. As a young man Ludwig displayed considerable vocal gifts, and after a short tour with the Durand Opera Company he joined the staff of Carl Rosa in 1874. Between the years 1875 and 1880 he won golden opinions as a baritone. He sang in Henry Walsham’s Company in 1878, and with the Blanche Cole Company in 1879, achieving as Vanderdecken in the ‘Flying Dutchman’ an unqualified success at Birmingham in J. W. Turner’s Opera Company. At the initial production of Goring Thomas’s ‘Esmeralda,’ at Drury Lane, by Carl Rosa’s Company, Ludwig created the part of Frilto, on March 26, 1883. Less than a fortnight later he took part in the first performance of ‘Colomba,’ by Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie (April 5, 1883). He toured America in 1886-88, and in 1896 rejoined the Carl Rosa Company, creating the part of Hans Sachs in the ‘Meistersingers’ at Manchester on April 16. He appeared at the Garrick Theatre, London, in January, 1897, and then went on a second American tour, followed by a third. His last operatic appearance was at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, with the Carl Rosa Company, at Christmas, 1910.

In oratorio, too, Mr. Ludwig has appeared with conspicuous success, notably in 1884, in the ‘Elijah’ (when he sang with Joseph Maas), and in Rubinstein’s ‘Paradise Lost.’ However, it was as a concert singer that he made a new departure by giving for twelve years purely Irish concerts, and popularising old Irish ballads like ‘Brennan on the Moor,’ ‘Crotty’s Lament,’ &c. In later years the rich quality of his voice was marred by a pronounced vibrato, which became a perfect mannerism.

‘He was a great favourite at the annual St. Patrick’s Day Concerts in London, and introduced many songs that are now found in all Irish repertoires, such as ‘The Crotty Boy,’ ‘The Boys of Wexford,’ ‘Carrighoun,’ and ‘The West’s asleep.’ Nor must it be forgotten that he often gave up lucrative engagements to sing in the cause of charity, and for years he sang on Sundays at the services in the Passionist Church, Highgate.’

We understand that a Musical Festival will be held at Cardiff on October 5, 1914, with Sir Frederic Cowen as conductor-in-chief. Works—in some cases new—by W. H. Reed, Williams, Josef Holbrooke, Elgar, David Jenkins, Edward German, and Sir Frederic Cowen will be included in the programme.

GRAND OPERA IN ENGLISH.

MR. RAYMOND RÔZE'S SEASON.

Once again the flag of grand opera in English is raised in the Metropolis, this time at Covent Garden, where on November 1 Mr. Raymond Rôze opened a short season of grand opera in the vernacular. The primary object of the undertaking was the production of Mr. Rôze's own historical music-drama on the ever-attractive subject of 'Joan of Arc.' Other works such as Wagner's 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' and 'Tristan,' with Gounod's 'Faust,' Bizet's 'Carmen,' Humperdinck's 'Hansel and Gretel,' and a new ballet, are features of the scheme set forth in the preliminary prospectus. Immediate recognition of one of the weak spots in the plan of opera in English has been noted by Mr. Rôze, and he promises that 'Carmen' shall be given in the new version of the book provided by Mr. Hermann Klein and published some time ago. A less urgent need is represented in the promised new translation into English by Mr. Alfred Kalisch of the libretto of Gounod's 'Faust.' This was scarcely necessary at all. The version made by H. F. Chorley for the English production of the work in 1864 stands to-day high fifty years later as one of the best examples of 'Englishing' ever made from a foreign libretto. But at the time of going to press, when most of the five weeks of the season have passed, no date is fixed for the production of this new version. Wagner's 'Tristan' and 'Tannhäuser' have been seen, and the rest of the time has been taken up with Mr. Rôze's own opera.

'JOAN OF ARC.'

Originally heard in a concert-version given at Queen's Hall four years ago, Mr. Rôze is announced as having spent twelve years in composing his opera. Like Wagner he is his own librettist, an arrangement that has a great deal to commend it, since if any objections are to be made they are not likely to be attended with blows. Save for its peaceful possibilities the plan in this case has not been of great service to the composer. Two heads are generally preferable to one, especially where a first attempt is concerned, and it is probable that a second head would have pointed out sundry defects in Mr. Rôze's libretto. He does not follow the Schiller design, but nevertheless adheres well to the historical facts. The Maid of Orleans is happily one of those historical figures about which we are uncommonly well informed. There is actually in existence in the Musée Tour Jeanne d'Arc, at Rouen, a sketch of her face made at the time of her trial five hundred years ago.

Mr. Rôze depicts all the principal events. He does so either vivâ voce through his characters, or by means of some tableaux vivants. Thus, one way or another, the whole of the story of her life is given. The battle scenes, the imprisonment, trial, and final burning at the stake are shown by means of tableaux. The opera begins at the beginning at Domremy, where we see Joan, not tending her flock but her flax, since she is shown with a spinning wheel outside the village church. She announces her convictions implanted in her by means of the mysterious voices; and her father, a clear-speaking if not plain-speaking man, has visions of his own. Next we are in the Hall of the Castle at Chinon, where the Dauphin is holding court. After a preliminary ballet Joan is announced, and makes her appearance so far forward with her mission as to have adopted male attire. After due trial of her powers of divination she is, on the strength of her powers of perception, entrusted with the command of the Army. Living pictures show her first essaying the storming of Orleans; her entry into the liberated city. Then the characters come to life again; this time in the camp of the allied English and Burgundians. Here there is a scene between the scoffing Isabeau and Philip, Duke of Burgundy, followed by the appearance of Joan leading a charge. Her sympathy for a mortally-wounded English soldier causes her to remain in the camp. She makes the acquaintance of Philip, who introduces himself in the free and open-hearted manner of the period by means of an axe with which he proposes to kill the Maid. She persuades him to the contrary. Dunois, who appeals to her as a lover, is rejected, and after Joan has uttered an Ave Maria with the assistance of a chorus (off), the sleeping soldiers are aroused and Philip, Dunois, and Joan, in good amity, make for Rheims. The coronation of Charles is shown in a picture, this time a moving one of great pomp and circumstance and of much quaintness. The next stage illustrates Joan at the zenith of her power and sufficiently influential to induce Charles not to sign the armistice which shall relieve Paris. Joan's 'voices' leave her, but fortified by the regard of Dunois she goes on with her work as per historical record. The scene and the active part of the open opera close with mutual confidences between Joan and Dunois and their setting out for Compiegne. Tableaux show Joan taken prisoner, her trial, her martyrdom at the stake and her final translation, and the adoration of her remains by the people who have already canonised her.

Mr. Rôze's music shows much resourcefulness. That resourcefulness is not always self-contained. There are many effective passages. The choral-writing in particular is always telling because of its excellent construction. The instrumental colouring is also admirable, and the score is of notable homogeneity. The fact that the composition of the work was extended over twelve years and that it was heard in its completed form four years ago accounts for much of the music not being of to-day. Good knowledge of the requirements of the stage is shown, and the Coronation scene is carried out to broad musical effects that create a definite impression. There is dramatic impulse in Queen Isabeau's openly expressed contempt for Joan, and the scene between the Maid and Philip is good operatic stuff. Elsewhere Mr. Rôze's matter does not always fit the situation, although he never fails to indicate undoubted powers of eloquence. There is great spirit in the scene at the Castle of Chinon, and the introductory choral dance is a notable example of the composer's adaptability. Generally the style is somewhat lyrical for the subject, and in the actual appeal of his music Mr. Rôze has rather handicapped himself by his choice of words which apparently do not always lend themselves to felicitous musical accentuation. Two casts were employed. The first comprised Miss Lilian Granfelt as an appealing Joan, Mr. Charles Mott as a vigorous and impressive Duke of Burgundy, Mr. Henry Rabke as Charles, Mr. Raoul Torrent as Dunois, and Miss Dora Gibson as Queen Isabeau. The alternative cast included Mlle. Marta Wittkowska as Joan, Mr. Raymond Loder as Charles, Mr. Harold Colonna as Dunois, Mr. Harry Reynolds as Philip, and Miss Edythe Goodman as Isabeau. In point of equipment the production is memorable because of the splendour of the costumes, its historical accuracy, and the general impressiveness of the setting. The work has been given three and four times a week since the season began and to growing appreciation.

'TRISTAN AND ISOLDA.'

When the new opera had settled down, Mr. Rôze gave Wagner's 'Tristan and Isolde' with a cast that included Mlle. Marta Wittkowska as Isolde and Mr. John Coates as Tristan. Mlle. Wittkowska has recently developed sundry high notes in her voice that justify her in attempting soprano rôles. Her Isolde had plenty of vigour in its initial stages, but strain soon became obvious and the tunefulness of her singing declined. Mr. John Coates gave a very notable impersonation of Tristan. It was remarkable as characterization, for its vocal effect, and for its power as an exposition of a much abused character. Mlle. Juliette Autran acted Brangaena with much skill, giving more point than usual to the part, but her voice lacks the necessary weight for the music. Mr. Charles Mott showed himself as an artist of high promise by his work as Kurwenal, and the music of King Mark was finely sung by Mr. Manitto Klitgaard. Quite a feature of the representation was the direction of the orchestra by Mr. Hamilton Hart. Although new to the work of operatic conducting he was able to express a great deal, and to show that with the necessary experience he would have no difficulty in attaining distinction in this branch of his art. The stage part of the performance was disfigured by some freak lighting during the duet in the Second Act which resulted in the lovers being bathed in bright red moonlight.

'TANNHÄUSER.'

In mounting this well-known work as his third opera, Mr. Rôze laid himself open to some severe criticisms. It revealed weaknesses in his company. Miss Bettina Freeman, who appeared as Elizabeth, did not rise to any great heights owing to the absence of any extensive command of vocal colour. Mr. John Coates, who appeared as Tannhäuser, was artistic as usual, but could not conquer the difficulty arising from the fact that the music does not suit him save in the last Act, when he sang admirably. The other characters were not of a high level, with the exception of Mr. Harry Reynolds, who gave a vocally excellent account of the music of the Landgrave. Miss May Stora as Venus, Miss Maude Garnette as the Shepherd Boy, Mr. Henry Rabke as Wolfram, did not sound any great depths, and moreover, helped to defeat rather than advance the whole reason of opera in English by failing to pronounce their words clearly. Mr. Frank Bridge conducted, but rather succumbed to the manifold difficulties of directing a much 'cued' opera such as this.

FRANCIS E. BARRETT.

'GIULIANA': A NEW ENGLISH OPERA.

At Cheltenham, on November 19, the Moody-Manners Opera Company added to the list of native operas produced by them a one-act example entitled 'Giuliana,' composed by Mr. David Knox. The libretto, by Signor E. Golisciani, tells a story of Italian love, hate, and summary vengeance, in which hapless women, a village lover, and a wicked Count are concerned. Mr. Knox's music is highly charged with the quality styled a 'sense of the stage.' He conveys it with a good deal of confidence in the matter of orchestration, and with fluent command of melodic phrase. There is good differentiation between the various characters and emotional phases of the story, and the whole is a work of undoubted promise. The composer has the right stuff in him; all he wants is experience in conveying it. Few first operas have carried so much conviction at their initial hearing. The parts, all of them prominent, were taken by Madame Susanna Salvini (Giuliana), Mr. Frank Christian (Paolo), Mr. Flintoft Moore (Count), Miss Olive Westwood (Marta), and Mr. Hubert Dunkerley (Lorenzo). The composer conducted in excellent style, and the opera was well received.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

On December 3 and 10, two lectures will be given at the Royal Academy of Music by Mr. Oscar Beringer. The subjects are 'English clavier music of the 16th-18th centuries,' and 'French and German clavier music of the 16th-18th centuries.'

The George Mence Smith Scholarship for a non-student displaying good voice and musical aptitude is open for competition, the last day for receiving entries being December 10.

A chamber concert was given by the Academy in the Duke's Hall on November 3. Movements from concerted works by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Dvorák, were played, and a song 'La Rose' by Mr. Adolf Hallis, a student, was heard for the first time.

THE GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The annual prize-giving and concert took place on October 25, in the presence of the then Lord Mayor (Sir David Burnett) and Lady Mayoress. An address, reviewing the year's work of the school, was given by the principal, Mr. Landon Ronald, and the Lady Mayoress distributed the prizes, of which the chief were as follows:—The gold medal to Elizabeth Weiss; the Knill challenge cup and Bechstein Scholarship to Eric Zardo; the Musicians' Company silver medal to John E. Hope. Corporation Scholarships were granted to Louis Godowsky, Rebe Kussmann, Nellie Walker, Gladys Broxup, and Herbert V. Templeman. The Melba Scholarship was awarded to Dorothy M. Waring; the Knoop Scholarship to Mary Critchlow; the Mercers' Scholarship to Margaret Harrison; the Merchant Taylor's Scholarship to Carl True; the Lord Mayor's and Lady Mayoress's prizes to Phyllis Dicksee and Edith Harbry; the Principal's prize, for promise of a public career, to Reginald Herbert.

A concert formed part of the proceedings, the programme being contributed by Miss D. Augusta Chilton-Griffin (pianist), Miss Muriel Hay (violinist), Miss W. Jamieson, Miss Doro hy Waring, and Mr. Christian Obert (vocalists).

THE MUSICIANS' COMPANY.

A banquet was given by this Company on October 28, at Stationers' Hall. The new Master, Mr. Clifford B. Edgar, D.L., J.P., presided, and the large company present included: Mr. W. P. Fuller (the immediate Past-Master), the Earl of Shaftesbury, Lord Marchamley, Captain A. C. Chamier (Senior Warden), Mr. C. L. Collard (Junior Warden), Mr. T. C. Fenwick (Clerk), Sir Alexander Kennedy, Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Edward Cooper, Sir George Truscott, Sir Homewood Crawford, Sir Herbert Marshall, Col. T. C. F. Somerville, Lieut.-Col. J. T. Phillips, Sir George Martin, Sir William Gibbons, Sir Edward Letchworth, Mr. Landon Ronald (Principal, Guildhall School of Music, who earlier in the evening was admitted to the roll of Honorary Freeman of the Company), Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., Mr. J. Boyton, M.P., Dr. W. G. Alcock, Dr. W. G. McNaught, Dr. T. L. Southgate, Mr. S. Ernest Palmer, Major A. J. Stretton, Mr. W. W. Cobbett. After the usual loyal toasts, Mr. Fuller proposed the toast of 'The Worshipful Company of Musicians,' coupled with the name of the new Master, and in an interesting survey of the operations of the Company during the past twelve months, mentioned that the three Company's Scholarships at the Guildhall School of Music (which were given by Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Ernest Palmer), were now filled up. He reported the unveiling, by the Duchess of Abercorn, of the window presented by the Company to the new Guildhall at Londonderry to commemorate the former association of the Musicians' Company with the Fishmongers' Company in the Plantation of Ulster. Miss Alice Prendergast had given £500 in memory of her late brother, Mr. Arthur H. D. Prendergast (a Freeman of the Company), to be invested for the purpose of apprenticing City choir boys to musical instrument traders. It was hoped that this trust would expand into a large scheme. He offered congratulations to Alderman and Past-Master Cooper on his receiving the honour of knighthood. He welcomed the new Master, and said he was known in and out of the Company as an accomplished amateur musician; and he referred to his civic and musical work eulogistically.

Mr. Edgar, in a brief reply, stated that there were things in connection with the Company of which it was justly proud. Kings could to-day confer charters, but they could not confer antiquity. The Company was increasing in usefulness and strength and unity of feeling amongst its members.

The health of the new Honorary Freeman, Mr. Landon Ronald, was proposed by Sir Edward Ernest Cooper. He said the Musicians' Company had one important distinction—that it represented a living Art which was a universal language. He referred to the distinguished abilities of Mr. Landon Ronald as a conductor, and said he was a composer of melody, an important matter in these days.

Mr. Landon Ronald, in responding, made an optimistic speech as to the quality and prospect of British music. His sympathies were strongly with the younger generation of composers who were struggling for recognition. But even they must remember that the now well-known musicians, such as Mackenzie, Parry, Stanford, had infinitely greater difficulty in getting their early work heard. This change was owing to there being many more orchestral concerts than there were. More than by any other agency the cause of British music had been served by the great Academies of Music and the 'Ernest Palmer' Patron's Fund. While we should do all we could to support the British musician, we must not shut the door on foreign artists and music, because that would tend to stultify the art. In this century, there was no talent, no genius, that was hidden—all had a chance. He concluded by saying that he hoped to make the Guildhall School one of the greatest, if not the greatest in the Kingdom.

The toast of the guests was proposed by Mr. C. L. Collard and responded to by Lord Marchamley and Sir Alexander Kennedy. The latter amateur gave some interesting reminiscences of his association with the late Herr Joachim.

The Company's silver medals were presented by the Master to Arthur Charlett Green, of the Royal Naval School of Music; to Student Leo Paul Bradley, L.R.A.M., of the Royal Military School of Music; and to John Ernest Hope, Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O., of the Guildhall School of Music.

During the evening a selection of vocal and instrumental music was given by Miss Lilian Stiles-Allen, Miss Nellie Walker, Mr. Alfred Steed, and Mr. Reginald Herbert, and a string quartet (Mr. Herbert Templeman, Mr. George Stratton, Miss Nellie Ridding, and Mr. John Francis). Mr. J. Ernest Hope played pianoforte solos and Miss Jenny Hyman accompanied.

THE LIVERY CLUB DINNER.

As a St. Cecilia celebration, the Livery Club of the Worshipful Company of Musicians held a dinner at Skinner's Hall on November 21, a large and distinguished gathering being present. The chair was occupied by Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., President of the Club. The toast of the President was proposed by Sir Homewood Crawford. Sir Ernest Clarke proposed the visitors, for whom Sir Samuel Evans responded. The following excellent musical programme, appropriate to the occasion, was arranged under the direction of Miss Gwynne Kimpton:

Antiphon, 'Cantantibus organis Cæcilia' Peter Philips.

Motet, for soprano and bass, 'Veni electa mea Cæcilia' ... Richard Deering.

Ode to St. Cecilia ... George Holmes.

A burlesque Ode on St. Cecilia's Day ... Bonnell Thornton.

The final number was omitted owing to the lateness of the hour. The singers were Masters M. Donegan and J. Wood, Messrs. A. Cockell, A. Whitehead, A. Thorogood, J. K. McLean, and H. Langley. A band of ten string players supported the voices. All except the double-bass player, Mr. C. Winterbottom, were ladies.

BACH CHAMBER CONCERTS.

It cannot be said that Bach is neglected in England, but it is true that he is widely misunderstood. To instance his most popular works, 'Brandenburg' Concertos are listened to with ears attuned to modern orchestral writing, the B minor Mass is judged on standards learned from 'Elijah' and 'Gerontius,' and the 'Wohltemperiertes Klavier' is taught as a specimen of science. Tendencies such as these can be corrected where Bach's music is given under proper conditions of performance and under proper conditions of listening. Both requirements are met by Dr. R. R. Terry's Bach chamber concerts, which are given periodically at Westminster Cathedral Hall. The first was referred to in our issue for August (p. 542). The series was continued on October 28. The Cathedral Choir again assisted, their contribution being the Cantata, 'Weinen, Klagen,' and the Motet for double choir, 'The Spirit also helpeth us.' The Brandenburg Concerto No. 2, in F, was played by a small orchestra from the Society of Women Musicians, who also helped in the Concerto for four pianofortes and strings. The pianists were Mr. E. S. Mitchell, Miss Katharine Eggar, Mr. Denis Browne, and Mr. Harold Howell. Miss Hélène Dolmetsch and Miss Dorothy Moggridge played a Sonata for viola da gamba and harpsichord. Lack of space forbids the description of performances that were always of a good standard, and in the case of the last mentioned, of the nature of perfection. Dr. Terry, who conducted, and those who assisted, devoted themselves to the real Bach, and there could have been few in the large audience who were unresponsive to this influence. Perhaps many felt it for the first time.

RAILWAY MUSIC.

As far as we know, the work produced by the Great Eastern Railway Musical Society on November 5 is the first piece of railway music. Our memory is obscure as to whether it was Wilkie Bard who appeared in a railway-porter turn and had verses and accompaniment to introduce his gag. But there the word 'music' scarcely applies. Perhaps a railway part-song has been sung by some small band of choralsists from a provincial shed. Certainly the first important work of the kind is 'Men on the line,' a cantata for male-voices and orchestra, with words by Mr. W. J. Galloway, the honorary conductor of the Society mentioned above, and music by Mr. Hubert Bath, his assistant orchestral conductor. The verses cleverly and colloquially express, in irrepensible metre, some characteristic incidents of life in a terminus.

A brisk overture, with a gentle middle-section, describes the bustle and commotion of a big railway terminus. The voices enter (in the manner of Tonio in 'I Pagliacci,' but to less emotional music) singing: 'Kind friends, accept a word of explanation. We are no minstrels; just hard-working men.' They tell of travellers who, when in doubt, consult the Guard, and we have to a serviceable tune:

'I say, Guard—

Some of us want to smoke,
The ladies have raided the smoking-car,
And this is beyond a joke.
The only vacant part of the train
Is the one for ladies only.
May we go there for a change of air
With our pipes, and chance being lonely?'

and so on. Presently we see the forger fleeing from the law; but his fate overtakes him to a good march-tune, first ppp, then ff, in the form of 'detectives three of the C.I.D., of Scotland Yard the pride.' A mother weeps farewell to her child, and the express is soon sent off 'with a toast to King Coal's most combustible soul.'

The music is always racy and appropriate. It never halts or misses the mark, and is extremely practicable. The composer conducted an excellent performance. The 'Meistersinger' Overture and movements from Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony helped to make an excellent programme. The choir, whose chorus-master is Mr. H. B. Dickinson, gave glees and part-songs, and Miss Rosina Buckman sang. The audience, as is always the case at these concerts, tested the capacity of Hamilton Hall (in the Great Eastern Railway Hotel) and gave way to enjoyment without reserve.

London Concerts.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Strauss's 'Festliches Präludium,' heard at Queen's Hall for the first time in England on November 4, proved a thorough-going pièce d'occasion. The purpose of the work and its unusual demands for orchestral resources were described in our November issue. The object of the increase in string power was to provide balance to a huge array of brass. No new effects of string writing came through. It is bombastic music, imposing in more senses than one, and good food for the fiery pride of a German festival gathering. It contributed to the interest of the occasion by providing ninety-six string players for the performance of Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and Beethoven's fifth Symphony. Here the resulting sonority and richness were magnificent, although at times too much so to be entirely manageable, even by Herr Mengelberg. The Morris was mockery à la Pélissier. Señor Joan Manen gave a fine interpretation of Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' The 'Kaisermarsch' of Wagner, at the beginning of the programme, somewhat took the wind out of Strauss's sails.

A startling innovation was made on November 20, when a large part of the programme was supplied by the Oriana Madrigal Society, under the direction of Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott. In a selection of madrigalian music and a group of part-songs the choir made fair advocacy of the possibilities of unaccompanied choral singing. The female-voice Round, 'Love, love, sweet love,' and Byrd's male-voice Canon, 'Hey ho! to the greenwood,' provided the most effective moments in the older music; in the madrigals for full-choir the blend and discipline were not perfect. There was more certainty and vitality in the singing of part-songs by Parry, Stanford, and Balfour Gardiner. The centre of interest in the orchestral programme was Mr. Frederic Austin's Symphony, given for the second time in London. The impression was deepened that the work is of an experimental nature. Mr. Austin has evolved an advanced and elaborate idiom of his own—for his music is not imitative or reminiscent—but is not thoroughly a master of it or cognizant of its possibilities. That these exist cannot be doubted. Mr. Austin's type of thought and expression contain the seed of new things, which we hope to see grow to life. The fault of the Symphony is that, though muscular music, it is heavy-handed and indecisive. The programme included Mr. Arnold Bax's 'In the fairy hills,' Dr. Vaughan Williams's third 'Norfolk Rhapsody,' and Mr. Gustav von Holst's 'In the street of the Ouled Nails.' The last-named, a brilliantly successful piece of tone-painting, made its customary effect, and earned a great reception for the composer, who conducted. Mr. Balfour Gardiner was the conductor-in-chief of the concert.

THE NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert given at Queen's Hall on November 3 by this fine Orchestra exemplified the deep appreciation which Mr. Landon Ronald feels for Elgar's orchestral works, and at the same time it demonstrated the exceptional skill and insight which this now celebrated conductor brings to bear on his interpretations. The programme was formed wholly from Elgar's compositions, and included the Variations for orchestra, the new Symphonic-study 'Falstaff' (recently produced at the Leeds Festival and now presented in London for the first time), and the second Symphony. No doubt Mr. Ronald was specially stimulated to secure the fine performance that was given of 'Falstaff' because the work is dedicated to him. Certainly on this occasion the many beauties of the Tone-poem were made clear. It will no doubt be some time before this latest emanation from Elgar will be fully appreciated by the public, simply because so much of its appeal is derived from the association of details with the character of Falstaff and incidents of his career. Until this association is built up it can only be listened to as abstract music which may yield pleasure to the ear, although its purpose may not be felt. As to the interpretation of the Symphony we are disposed to agree with the generally-expressed verdict that on no previous occasion has the work been performed so splendidly. Mr. Ronald does not conceal his conviction that this Symphony is one of the greatest of modern art-works of any country, and he was supremely successful in demonstrating the strong foundation he has for his faith. It was much to be regretted that the audience was a comparatively small one, but its enthusiasm was unbounded. Mr. Ronald, so far from being daunted by this lack of appreciation of some of the finest work ever done by a British composer, immediately arranged to repeat 'Falstaff' and the Symphony at a concert announced to take place on November 27. We trust we shall be able to record that this event was successful in every way.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The last few evenings of the Promenade Concerts provided several points of interest, and one novelty. The concert of October 23 introduced a not very striking Ballade for pianoforte and orchestra by Gabriel Faure, played by Mlle. Emilienne Bompard, and a Suite, 'Au soleil,' by the Russian composer, Vassilenko. The five movements of this work suggest various ways in which earth responds to sun, in fact and in fable. It is mainly descriptive music, showing a clever hand at scoring but no great musical invention.

The first Symphony Concert, on November 1, introduced matter of interest, new and old. In the case of Herr Max Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style' for orchestra, Op. 123, wherein the composer colours the idiomatic outlines of two hundred years ago with harmonies and other technical ways that were invented later, the interest evaporated as the work proceeded. Sir Hubert Parry's fifth Symphony earned more sustained attention. Its four sections, 'Stress,' 'Love,' 'Play,' and 'Now!' and their effect were described in these columns at the time of the first performance of the work. A second hearing served to intensify one's admiration for the open, vigorous thought and the fertility of idea that abound. The audience seemed to feel and understand the appeal of the work fully, and gave a warm reception to the composer, who himself directed the performance. Dohnányi gave an admirable performance of Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte concerto, and the last item was Moussorgsky's 'Une nuit sur le mont chauve.'

The Symphony Concert of November 15 was notable for the supreme excellence with which everything was done, although the chief material—Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto and Brahms's fourth Symphony—scarcely deserved such devotion. The violin soloist was M. Mischa Elman, who gave strong meaning to every passage in the Concerto, whether sentimental or virtuosic. The Symphony was played with fine sonority, purity of detail, and purposeful expression. The programme was completed with Dvůřák's 'Slavonic Dance' (No. 3) and Ravel's 'Rapsodie Espagnole.'

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The new policy of this organization, by which new works and British works are excluded from the programmes, has been triumphantly vindicated at the first two concerts, for the Queen's Hall was practically full on both occasions. On October 27 the ancient habit of including two Symphonies in one programme was imitated, and Brahms's third and Beethoven's fifth were given under Herr Steinbach's direction. The performances, though not memorable, were of high quality. Many passages were played with individual thoughtfulness and breadth of interpretative idea. Beethoven's Overture, 'Leonora' (No. 3), opened the concert, and between the Symphonies came Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto No. 6, in B flat, which is scored for violas, violoncellos, double-basses, and pianoforte.

Herr Steinbach again conducted on November 10, and gave estimable interpretations of Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, and Beethoven's Violin concerto. The soloist was Miss Isolde Menges, whose reading was on a level with the rest of the evening's performance in being sound and reliable, but uninspiring.

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The season of this Society opened with the customary performance of 'Elijah,' under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge. The choral singing again attained the standard of effectiveness set up by the previous work of the Society. The 'Baal' choruses were interpreted with striking significance. The chief soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt. Mr. H. L. Balfour was at the organ.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

For the first concert of its season, given at Queen's Hall on October 29, this organization occupied itself with two works that it had previously introduced to London—Wolf Ferrari's 'La Vita nuova' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' Of these the second was far the more welcome and popular, as was shown by the attitude of the audience. The choir sang throughout the concert with intelligence, spirit, and excellent tone, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Fagge. The four soloists were Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Gladys Palmer, Mr. Haigh Jackson, and Mr. John Prout.

The Royal Amateur Orchestral Society gave an excellent concert at Queen's Hall on November 5, under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Payne. Saint-Saëns's seldom-heard Symphony in A minor was a good choice for the principal work in the programme, as it is worthy of occasional resuscitation and is suitable material for proficient amateurs. The soloists, who contributed to the value of the concert, were Miss Isolde Menges (violinist) and Miss Ella Caspers (vocalist).

Dr. Charles Wood's 'A ballad of Dundee,' for chorus and orchestra, was performed by the Royal College of Music on November 6, under Sir Charles Stanford's direction. Mr. William H. Greene, a scholar, was bass soloist. The same programme included Schumann's second Symphony and Lalo's F major Violin concerto, with Miss Ivy Wigmore as soloist.

The 'Van Buren Ladies' Orchestra,' a new organization under the conductorship of Miss Muriel Jack, made its début at the Little Theatre on November 6. It consists of strings, solo wind, harp, and timpani, and was assisted at the pianoforte. The programme, which was carried out with high ability, included Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture, and three new 'May dances' by Miss Lita Jaratt, a member of the orchestra. The solo artists were Miss May Bartlett (violin), Miss Phyllis Richards, Miss Violet Fielding (vocalists), and Miss Lilian Mather (reciter).

The first of the present series of Orchestral Concerts for the Young took place under Miss Gwynne Kimpton's direction at the Duke's Hall, Royal Academy of Music, on November 8. Mr. Stewart Macpherson was again the lecturer, and Mr. Leonard Borwick (pianist) and Mr. Foxton Ferguson (vocalist) were the soloists. Mozart's G minor Symphony was admirably performed.

Members of the Music Club and their friends assembled at the Grafton Galleries on November 17, to hear Erich Korngold's new Violin and Pianoforte sonata (Op. 6), with M. Nandor Zsolt and Mr. Richard Epstein as executants. It was disappointing to find that the work contained little music that was of vital interest. The technique and advancement of manner were again extraordinary for so young a composer, but they were a substitute, and not a medium, for ideas. It is the old story of a composer too fascinated by his newly-found powers to turn them to useful account. The remainder of the evening's music was excellent, specially such as was contributed by 'Kammersänger' Hermann Gura.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Wessely Quartet opened their season at Bechstein Hall on October 25, the programme consisting of a Mozart Quartet in B flat, Glière's Quartet in G minor, and Schubert's String quartet in C (with Mr. Crabbe as second violin). The playing was of delightful quality throughout.

Two concerts have been given at Bechstein Hall by the Flonzaley Quartet. On October 28, the programme consisted of Beethoven's Quartet in C minor (Op. 18), Schubert's 'Der Tod und das Mädchen' Quartet, and a Sonata by Leclair for two violins.

All other recent events in the realm of chamber-music have been overshadowed by the second concert of the Flonzaley Quartet, for it brought the first performance in London of Arnold Schönberg's String quartet (Op. 6). It can be safely said that a great number of the audience came to sneer, and it ought to be true that most of them remained to praise. To the ordinary listener ear the Quartet is far from plain-sailing, but it contains page after page of fine, virile, and often beautiful writing. There is plenty of harsh dissonance and plenty of super-free counterpoint, but the grating passages do not loom larger than those that are interesting and admirable. It is a thousand pities that Schönberg did not stay longer on a level with his unlighted contemporaries before taking his later flights. The only real difficulty in judging of this Quartet at a single hearing was to perceive coherence and design in it. It is in one long, long movement, with a number of sections in which it was hard to find connectedness. It seemed to lose nothing in performance, for it was played with ease and familiarity. One was never in doubt that the effects heard were those imagined by the composer. It was bold, but perfectly correct, to open the concert with Mozart and to conclude with Haydn. The ancient and modern were too far apart to clash.

The Rosé Quartet played on behalf of the Classical Concert Society at Bechstein Hall on October 29, and again reached the highest level of human perfection in quartet playing. They were assisted by Mr. F. S. Kelly in giving a Brahms programme, in which the C minor String quartet (Op. 51, No. 1) and the Pianoforte quartet in A (Op. 26) were the chief works. At the next concert of the Society's series, which took place on November 5, the same body played Quartets by Mendelssohn (in E flat), Beethoven (in E minor), and Frank Bridge—the three 'Idylls.' Songs were given by Madame Julia Hostater.

An excellent concert of chamber music took place at the Royal College of Music on October 23. Tchaikovsky's D major String quartet was the chief concerted number. The novelty was Mr. F. Purcell Warren's 'Miniature Suite' of pleasant, light, descriptive music. At a similar concert of equal merit, given on October 30, the principal works played were Fauré's Pianoforte quartet in C minor and Brahms's String sextet.

The London Trio opened their season at Æolian Hall on November 17 with an admirable performance of Schubert's Pianoforte trio in B flat, Op. 99. The excellence of the ensemble was noteworthy. Songs were given by Mr. Paul Draper.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Madame Nina Jaques-Dalcroze, the wife of the famous propagandist of eurhythmics, is a singer of very high accomplishments. At Steinway Hall on October 28 she gave abundant pleasure with her interpretation of songs by Cornelius, Borodin, Moussorgsky, Erwin Lendvai, and M. Jaques-Dalcroze. At her second recital, on November 4, she introduced four further songs by her husband, who appears as a lyric writer of some eminence, and made up an excellent programme of works by Mahler, Gustav Ferrari, and Schubert.

Miss Frieda von Vukovic, a mezzo-soprano from Austria, made a good impression at Bechstein Hall on November 6.

Vocal recitals were also given by Miss Edith Wynne-Agabeg, with Miss Winifred Thompson, reciter (Steinway Hall, October 29), and by Mr. Charles Copland, with Miss Cordelia Coe, reciter, at the same hall in the evening; Miss Meta-Ling (Æolian Hall, November 5); Miss Elsie Dunham, with Miss Esther Walker, reciter (Steinway Hall, November 6); and Miss Roussel d'Elpin (Bechstein Hall, November 14).

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Mlle. Jehanne Chambard made a successful first appearance in London, on October 27, at Bechstein Hall. She played Schumann's Fantasia in C major very effectively.

On October 29 an interesting recital was given at Bechstein Hall by Mrs. Ernest Heasman, who played with considerable ability and discernment in music by Christian Bach, Schumann, d'Albert, Liszt, Chopin, and others. Songs were given by Miss Margaret McEwen.

Herr Dohnányi's eminence as a pianist seems less known to the general public than it deserves to be, as there was not a large audience at Æolian Hall on November 6, when he gave a recital. He played Bach, Schubert (the Sonata in G, Op. 78), and Chopin superbly, and supported his claims as a composer with four Rhapsodies, Op. 11.

Mr. Vivian Hamilton was compelled by ill-health to postpone the opening of his interesting series of concerts at Queen's Hall, and when, on November 17, the first concert eventually took place, he had to retire after performing one movement of Scharwenka's Pianoforte concerto. His compositions, however, were heard, and gave signs of considerable ability both in orchestral writing and in dramatic conception. The soloist in the vocal numbers was Mr. Montague Borwell. Sir Henry Wood conducted the Queen's Hall Orchestra.

Excerpts from 'Parsifal,' including the whole of the third Act, were 'illustrated' at the pianoforte by Madame Rose Koenig in the course of a Wagner recital at Leighton House on November 18.

M. de Pachmann gave his second and last recital of the season at Queen's Hall on November 19, before an interested and amused audience.

Pianoforte recitals were also given by Miss Pauline St. Angelo (Steinway Hall, October 25), Mr. John Thompson (Bechstein Hall, October 28), Miss Winifred Christie (Bechstein Hall, October 30), Miss Winifred Burston (Æolian Hall, October 31), Miss Adela Verne (Steinway Hall, November 4), Miss Vera Brock (Bechstein Hall, November 5), Dr. Dezső Szántó (Steinway Hall, November 5), Mr. Paul Roes (Æolian Hall, November 6), Miss Ellen Edwards, in conjunction with Miss May Mukle violoncellist, (Steinway Hall, November 6), Miss Clara Blackburne (Bechstein Hall, November 10), Miss Sarita Benaton (Bechstein Hall, November 11), Mr. Richard Ball Johnson (Trinity College of Music, November 11), M. Benno Moiseiwitsch (Bechstein Hall, November 15), Miss Norah Drewett (Steinway Hall, November 17), Miss Adela Verne (Steinway Hall, November 17), Madame Alma Haas (Steinway Hall, November 18), Miss Dorothy Martin (Steinway Hall, November 19).

VIOLIN RECITALS.

Sigmund Feuermann, the twelve-year-old pupil of Sevcik, increased the number of his admirers at Bechstein Hall on October 23.

Mr. Florizel von Reuter's series of three recitals was completed at Bechstein Hall on October 24.

Miss Daisy Kennedy, the Australian violinist, taught by Sevcik, gave a recital at Æolian Hall on November 11. She is one of the most brilliant and interesting of the younger performers of the day.

Interesting recitals were also given by Miss Dorothy Bridson at Æolian Hall on November 9, and Mr. Gustave B. Walther, a newcomer, at Bechstein Hall on November 12.

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

A concert was given at Steinway Hall on October 23 by Madame Saima Neovi, Miss Ellen Beck (vocalists), and Miss Johanne Stockmar (pianist).

Signor Luigi Gasparini, a promising violinist, made his first appearance in London on October 28 at Steinway Hall.

M. Octave Crémieux, the composer of popular waltzes, gave a concert of his own works at Æolian Hall on November 4.

Good ability and promise were shown by Miss Florence Panby, a pupil of Miss Mathilde Verne, and Miss Margaret Norton, a pupil of Madame Albani, at Bechstein Hall on November 7.

Mr. and Mrs. York Bowen, pianist and singer, gave a recital at Æolian Hall on November 12, with a varied and up-to-date programme. The songs included some of Mr. Bowen's, with viola and horn obbligati that were played by the composer himself.

The Classical Concert Society's programme at Bechstein Hall on November 12 took the form of a recital by Mr. Leonard Borwick (pianist) and Madame Jane Bathori-Engel, who gave songs by living French composers.

The Smallwood Metcalfe Choir opened their season at Queen's Hall on November 12 with a programme that, as usual, contained a selection of madrigals. A six-part song, 'The splendour falls on castle walls,' by G. A. Alcock, was given for the first time.

A recital was given at Bechstein Hall on November 13 by Mr. Harry Alexander (vocalist), and Mr. Mescher Parker (violinist), who was also heard upon the contrivoli, an instrument between a violoncello and a viola.

Mr. Arnold Trowell, the able violoncellist from Australia, showed maturing powers at Bechstein Hall on November 17.

Miss Adela Hamaton (pianist) and Miss Florence Macnaughton (vocalist) added to the interest of their recital at Æolian Hall, on November 18, by introducing vocal quartets by Dr. Walford Davies into the programme. Miss Macnaughton gave the first performance of some 'Essays in imitation' by Mr. Herbert Hughes in the form of settings of nursery rhymes.

The Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace have provided the following attractions: October 25, Miss Marie Hall; on November 8, Miss Susan Strong and Mr. Mark Hambourg.

The Saturday Popular Concerts at the Central Hall, Westminster, which opened on October 11, and continue as at present arranged until December 27, are proceeding with every kind of success. Well-known singers and players, too numerous to mention, are engaged. On December 6, part of the programme will be supplied by the band of H.M. Coldstream Guards, under Lieut. J. Mackenzie-Rogan. The concert on December 20 takes the form of a recital by Mr. Alexander Watson of Dickens's 'Christmas Carol.' The organist to the concerts is Mr. J. A. Meale.

Suburban Concerts.

As an example to other similar Societies who generally lie dormant throughout the summer months, the choral singing of the South London Musical Club at their 217th Smoking Concert on October 28 is to be commended. The choir of male voices attacked with confidence and success a number of glees and part-songs, including Bantock's difficult 'Variations on the "Piper o' Dundee," and another old air similarly treated by Dr. Charles Wood. The programme also included Sullivan's 'The long day closes' and three Cavalier songs for baritone and chorus by Sir C. V. Stanford, the soloist being the Club's President, Mr. Frederick Henry. Other members of the Club also sang solos, and further valuable assistance was rendered by Mr. Harold Wilde (tenor) and Miss Maud E. Grundy (solo harp). Mr. H. L. Balfour conducted, and Mr. William Every accompanied.

The Dulwich Philharmonic Society opened their season at the Crystal Palace on November 8, with a noteworthy performance of 'Elijah,' under the direction of their new conductor, Mr. Martin Klickmann. The principal soloists were Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Lysette Mostyn, Mr. William Sheen, and Mr. Dan Richards.

The People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies surpassed all their previous efforts on November 15 by their admirable performances of Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend.' The efficiency, vitality, and expressiveness of the choral singing did credit to the work of Mr. Frank Idle, the conductor. The chief soloists were Miss Maude Willby, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Julien Henry.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

M. Jacques Rouché has been appointed manager of the Grand-Opéra for a period of seven years, beginning on January 1, 1915. The choice meets with unanimous approval in artistic circles. The announcement of M. Rouché's appointment was immediately followed by M. André Messager's resignation. M. Messager's reason is that he considers the premature appointment, coming close upon a scandal in which the other manager of the Opéra, M. Broussan, is mixed, as offensive. He has consented, however, to retain the responsibility of the production of 'Parsifal,' which is to take place in January. Mr. Rouché has selected as musical manager M. Camille Chevillard.

The Théâtre des Champs-Élysées has closed its doors six months after the inauguration, summer vacation included. The smash, although it came as a surprise, was not altogether unforeseen. It is said that several schemes have been brought forward with a view to resuming the run of performances, or at least of ensuring the production of 'Parsifal,' in rivalry with the Grand-Opéra. In the meanwhile the last novelty produced, M. Isidore de Lara's veristic 'Les trois Masques,' continues its career at the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt.

A concert of Spanish music has been given by the Madrid Philharmony Orchestra, conducted by Señor Arbos. The programme comprised works by Albeniz, Conrado del Campo, and Turina.

Daily orchestral concerts have been started at the Théâtre-Femina. Interesting features in the first week's doings were the performances of Florent Schmitt's 'Feuilles de Voyage,' and Albeniz's 'Rhapsody' for pianoforte and orchestra, (soloist, M. Pierre Lucas).

Humperdinck's 'Moorish Rhapsody' was played on two successive Sundays at the Concerts Lamoureux. The verdict of most critics was decidedly unfavourable. No less scant success attended the production, at the same concerts, of a new Symphony by Georges Brun—a very conventional work.

At the Concerts Colonne were produced a commendable tone-poem by Marcel Grandjany, two fine songs by Alfred Bruneau, and the Cantata with which Mlle. Lili Boulanger won the Prix de Rome. The former was well received, the latter (entitled 'Faust et Hélène,' and sung by Madame Croiza, MM. Devriès and Ghasné) wildly applauded. It is, however, a cleverly executed task rather than the outcome of artistic imagination; and the success should be interpreted as a natural meed of praise to the young laureate, the first of her sex.

Saint-Saëns has made his last public appearance as a performer at a charity concert given on November 6 in the Salle Gaveau. He played the pianoforte and the organ in his customary magnificent style. The greater part of the programme was devoted to his own works. This concert took place exactly sixty-seven years and six months after the master's first appearance as a pianist (May 6, 1846, in the Salle Pleyel).

The well-known critic, M. Emile Vuillermoz, has of late been passing severe criticisms on Beethoven's music. 'The day shall come,' he wrote, 'when one will be able to assert that the greatest and best of Beethoven's genius is not of purely musical order, and that the sublimity of certain artistic ideals may be easily satisfied with trite melodies, conventional harmonies, and dull orchestration. Beethoven's ambitions went further than the ear.' The following week he remarked that 'even in the fourth Symphony (more cheerful than her eight sisters) the hollow, meagre orchestration sounds cruel to our 20th century ears.'

Considering the recent cases of Paul Dupin and Ernest Fanelli, remorselessly boomed as composers of genius, M. Louis Laloy writes an article to show that in either case the lack of discrimination displayed by enthusiasts has proved as harmful to the very objects of the misplaced, ephemeral enthusiasm as it was unsustainable.

The Cantata, 'Diane et Actéon,' admitted among the doubtful works of Rameau, has been discovered to belong to the output of Joseph Boismortier (1691-1765).

The Société Musicale Indépendante will give two concerts during the month of December.

The Société J. S. Bach will give concerts on December 19 ('Weinachts oratorium'); February 27 (Mass in B minor); and March 27 ('Matthäus' Passion).

A Société Palestrina has been founded, with the object of 'forwarding the cause of spiritual art, and more specially, Church music.' Its head is M. Léon Saint-Réquier. The first concert will comprise works by Bach, Beethoven, Franck, d'Indy, and Chausson. M. Vincent d'Indy is to lecture on 'Spiritual Art.'

The first concert of the Conservatoire was devoted to Schumann's 'Faust,' which was also given on November 23, at the Concerts Colonne.

A most useful short book on 'Gregorian music,' by the Rev. Gattard, a monk of Solesmes, has been published by Henri Laurens.

Gustave Charpentier has recast in ballet-form his Orchestral Suite 'Impressions d'Italie.'

The successor of MM. Isola at the Gaité Lyrique will in all likelihood be M. Charbonnel.

A most attractive chamber-music evening has been held at the Schola Cantorum by the Spanish Quartet 'Renacimiento.' The programme was devoted to César Franck, Borodine, and Turina.

A pupil of Chopin, M. Péro, is still alive at Paris. He is eighty-three, and still active. He will give, on December 11, in the Salle Pleyel, a pianoforte recital devoted to Chopin's works.

MUSIC IN RUSSIA.

ST. PETERSBURG.

At the Imperial Opera has been produced an opera by Schenk, 'The Miracle of the Roses,' whose subject is borrowed from the legend of Saint Elisabeth of Hungary. It is a picturesque work of a rather facile kind, but not devoid of elegance or of melodic charm.

At the new Lyric Theatre has been given Moussorgsky's 'Boris Godounov,' with Mozjookin, a débutant, in the title part. The performance was on the whole satisfactory, and the staging remarkably good.

The programme of the first Siloti-Concert comprised Rachmaninoff's second Symphony, Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, Liszt's first Pianoforte concerto, and songs by Roger-Ducas.

The composer César Cui, despite his advanced age (he was born in 1835), displays surprising activity. He has just written several miniature operas for children: 'Puss in Boots,' 'Red Riding Hood,' and 'Ivan the Fool' (this last after a Russian folk-tale), a String quartet, a Violin sonata, and set to music five of Krylov's Fables.

The fifty-years' jubilee of the conductor Napravnik will be celebrated this month.

An action concerning the libretto of Anton Rubinstein's opera, 'Der Dämon,' was recently settled in the Courts of Justice at Petersburg. Rubinstein wrote this work in 1871, and paid 500 roubles to Wiskowatoff, the author of the libretto. The latter, however, was extremely dissatisfied with the numerous alterations made by the composer, and stated in a letter (published at the time) that he disowned the authorship of the libretto. Composer and author being dead, Madame Tieling-Rubinstein has been drawing the whole of the performing-right fees. A short time ago, however, Miss Wiskowatoff put in a claim at the 'Société des Auteurs' for her share of the fee, on the ground that the libretto was the work of her father. The Tribunal has decided that all rights of the opera, text and music, belong to Madame Tieling-Rubinstein.

MOSCOW.

At the Theatre Zimin has been given Rimsky-Korsakoff's beautiful opera-ballet, 'Mlada,' seldom performed on account of the many difficulties attending its production. The score, which comprises a great number of unusual instruments, is one of the master's finest, and in its favour, as in favour of the picturesque scenery and stage effects, the weakness of the poem—which is of a rather cheap, fantastic order—may well be overlooked.

Another of Rimsky-Korsakoff's best lyric-plays, the 'Golden Cockerel,' was given at the Grand-Theatre. Here the orchestral setting offers no abnormal difficulty, but the vocal parts are far from easy. The singers, headed by Madame Nejdanova, Messrs. Pirogov and Bonatchich, did well. M. Emil Cooper conducted excellently.

A third opera by the same master, 'Tsar Saltan,' has also been added to the repertoire of the Grand-Theatre. It contains many fine parts, although at times more conventional in style.

Great interest attached to the production, at the Independent Theatre, of Moussorgsky's posthumous musical comedy 'The Fair at Sorotchinski,' the score of which was finished and scored by Karatyghin, Liadoff, and Sakhnovsky. The music may rank among the best of Moussorgsky's output, and teems with raciness and humour.

An opera by a young composer, Gloukhovtsoff, entitled 'The days of our life,' has been produced at the Theatre Zimin. It proved moderately original, the composer remaining under the influence of Tchaikovsky and of the Italian verists.

Scriabin has recently written a number of new works for pianoforte: Etudes, Op. 65, Preludes, Op. 67, Poems, Op. 69, and three Sonatas (Op. 66, 68, 70); they are all in his new, recondite, symbolic style, and contain many novel experiments in discords.

Prof. Inayat-Khan and his Hindu orchestra have given at the Conservatoire a highly attractive and successful concert of Hindu music.

Three concerts devoted to the chamber music of Serghéi Tanéïew have been given, the composer taking part as pianist. Tanéïew's music, classical as a general rule, delights at times by its geniality and freshness.

Rachmaninoff has written two important works, a Cantata, 'The Bells,' to words by Balmont, and a Pianoforte sonata.

On Sunday, November 16, the Brixton and District Musical Society visited the Brixton Prison, and under the direction of Mr. Frederick Williams suitably performed 'How lovely are the messengers,' 'By Babylon's Wave,' &c. The soloists were Miss Esther French and Mr. H. F. Williams.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association held their first popular Saturday night concert in the Town Hall on October 18, giving a performance of Berlioz's dramatic legend, 'Faust,' which fully taxed their powers. The attempt, laudable as it was, proved an ambitious effort on the part of an amateur musical organization, and it would have been more gratifying if they had chosen a less exacting and lighter work for their inaugural concert of the season. The principals were Madame Florence Parkes-Darby, Mr. Richard Ripley, Mr. Arthur Cranmer, and Mr. Charles Leeds. Mr. Joseph H. Adams conducted.

The Midland Musical Society's first concert of the current series took place in the Town Hall on October 25, the programme then provided being of a classical type, such as one rarely hears at a popular Saturday night concert, and consisted of Bach's Motet for double choir, 'Be not afraid,' Hubert Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Weber's Overture to 'Oberon,' and Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite. The choir were especially excellent in Sir Hubert Parry's glorious work, the voices being quite remarkable in power and excellently balanced. The feature of the Bach motet lay in the due observance of rhythmical accent and distinctness of phrasing. The orchestra gave an intelligent performance of the Symphony, gratifying in every way. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character. Operatic excerpts were given by Miss Minnie Barlow and Mr. Charles Mott, and Mr. A. J. Cotton conducted with skill and judgment.

The Chappell Ballad Concert Party gave a concert in the Town Hall on October 20. Mr. Max Mossel's first Drawing Room Concert of the present series of four was given as usual in the Grosvenor Room of the Grand Hotel on October 30. Miss Irene Scharrer, a favourite pianist at Birmingham, was supported by Miss Daisy Kennedy, the Australian violinist, in a delightful performance of Strauss's Sonata for pianoforte and violin. Miss Jean Waterston sang artistically, and Mr. G. H. Manton accompanied. Through the instrumentality of Miss Elma Baker, her teacher, Miss Cecilia Innis, a new contralto gifted with a voice of an excellent and rich timbre, gave a vocal recital at Queen's College on October 30 with much success. Master Paul Beard, the clever boy violinist, played a number of pieces with remarkable tone-power for one so young, and with an astonishing command over all forms of violin technique. Mr. G. H. Manton was the accompanist.

In the place of the customary lecture, the Birmingham Sunday Lecture Society gave in the Town Hall on October 26, a choral and orchestral concert specially organized and conducted by Mr. Wymark Stratton. He had the assistance of members of the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra and the Moorpool Musical Society, the latter augmented by chorists from the Birmingham Festival Choral Society. The chief choral work was Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast'; the choir also sang 'Sweet and Low,' and Faning's 'Song of the Vikings.' The performances were quite praiseworthy, and seemed to delight the crowded assembly present. Songs were given by a child soprano, Eva Benson, and by Mr. R. J. Holloway. In aid of the Children's Hospital Building Fund a concert was given in the Town Hall on November 5, organized and conducted by Mr. Frank J. Beach. The programme was entirely vocal, contributed by the Ladies' Grecian Choir and the Edgbaston Male Glee Singers.

A pianoforte recital was given by Miss Marjorie Sotham, assisted by Mr. Max Mossel (violin) and Mr. G. H. Manton (accompanist), at the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on November 6. The concert-giver is a performer of considerable artistic attainments, and is likely to make a position for herself in this country. Another pianoforte recital pure and simple was given in the Town Hall on November 12 by Mr. Leonard Rayner, who possesses a remarkably sensitive touch, and is complete master over a flawless technique.

In the Assembly Rooms of the Edgbaston High School for girls, Miss Hélène Dolmetsch gave a concert on November 11, assisted by Miss Dorothy Moggridge and Mr. Frederick Keel. Miss Dolmetsch is a remarkable player on the viola da gamba and the violoncello. In selections culled from Bach, Christopher Symphon, and Boccherini, she was assisted by Miss Moggridge at the pianoforte. The latter also contributed some pianoforte solos, and Mr. Frederick Keel, an exceedingly cultured baritone, sang with great charm some old German lieder and some Elizabethan songs.

The Birmingham Choral Union, ably conducted by Mr. Richard Wassell, gave Handel's 'Messiah' at the Town Hall on November 15. The choir were in excellent form, their singing being characterized by evenly balanced tone-power, firm attack, and artistic phrasing. The orchestra were all that could be desired, and the principals were in every way suited for their respective parts. They comprised Madame Fannie Copeland, Miss May Peters, Mr. Sam Hemsall, and Mr. William Evans. Mr. C. W. Perkins presided at the organ, and Mr. A. Corfield was responsible for the trumpet solo.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra held their first concert of the season in the Town Hall on November 8, the programme with one exception being entirely devoted to Wagner in commemoration of the centenary of his birth. Mr. Julian Clifford conducted with more than ordinary watchfulness, and under his baton the orchestra completely responded to his will. Mr. Clifford also appeared as solo pianist and played his own Concerto No. 1, in E minor, a short, melodious and graceful composition. Mr. Frank Mullings, the rising operatic tenor, achieved a phenomenal success with his inspired singing of the Trial songs and the Prize song from the 'Mastersingers.'

The second of the season's series of concerts organized by the Birmingham Chamber Concerts Society took place at the Queen's College, on November 12. The Catterall String Quartet again supplied the programme, which consisted of Mozart's Quartet in D major (K. No. 449), Debussy's Quartet in G minor, and Bach's Sonata in G major for violoncello and pianoforte, the latter being excellently performed by Mr. J. C. Hock and Dr. Rowland Winn. The interpretation of the two String quartets was of the highest artistic standard.

BOURNEMOUTH.

During the past month Bournemouth has had almost more music than it can cope with. Four, and even five days in a week have yielded concerts of importance at the Winter Gardens, and, on top of this centralised activity, there has been a week of opera under the auspices of the Moody-Manners Company at the Theatre Royal.

Crowded houses, it is understood, were the rule at the Moody-Manners' performances; and the writer can vouch for the fact at the performance of 'Lohengrin,' the only opera that he was able to hear. Taking everything into consideration, the production was an estimable one, although it cannot be gainsaid that it presented considerable deficiencies. Indeed, in a town such as this, where opportunities for enjoying the choicest excerpts from Wagner's works capitally performed by a first-rate orchestra (plus excellent vocalists) are so frequent, it is questionable whether a more or less incomplete stage performance assists towards a proper understanding of the music-dramas.

At the Winter Gardens the Symphony Concerts have afforded an immense amount of pleasure, the programmes having been constituted on a catholic basis, and the orchestral playing, under Mr. Dan Godfrey, being as good as anything previously heard at these long-established concerts. The following works proved of particular interest: Moussorgsky's exceedingly descriptive Fantasia, 'Une nuit sur le monte chauve'; five stirring fanfares (Liadoff-Glazounoff); a Symphony in C minor by Kopyloff; Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture; Montague F. Phillips's Symphony in C minor; Rimsky-Korsakoff's very pleasing Overture on Russian Themes (Op. 28); and Schumann's romantic Symphony in C, the performance of the last-named being especially powerful and impressive. Russian music has been exhaustively exploited, this searching examination of the 'Nationalist' group being long overdue. The performance of the Kopyloff work was the first in England, the music proving fresh and melodious, if not strikingly original. Mr. Phillips conducted his own composition, a clever and earnest piece of writing. The soloists have maintained a lofty standard on each occasion: Miss Muecia Albertini was unconventional in Grieg's beautiful Pianoforte concerto; M. Jacques Kühner played Saint-Saëns's charming Violoncello concerto in A minor like a true artist; a revival of Tchaikovsky's unequal Pianoforte concerto in G was rendered noteworthy by the splendidly finished, if slightly unemotional playing of Miss Johanne Stockmarr; and Glazounoff's fine Violin concerto was dexterously performed by Miss Ivy Anglo.

The Monday 'Pops,' also, have not sought for approbation in vain. On October 20 a 'Shakespeare' programme was given, to which songs were contributed by Miss Nina Samuell-Rose. Russian music occupied the programme on October 27, with M. Mendelchitz as violin soloist. The week following brought an 'Opera' programme, in which Bournemouth's leading soprano, Miss Nora Read, gave much pleasure with her reading of Weber's effective aria, 'Ocean, thou mighty monster.' A selection from Brahms filled the bill on November 10, when the Sonata in F for pianoforte and violoncello was capably played by Miss Edith Leah (of Bournemouth) and Mr. S. Coelho (of the Municipal Orchestra).

Miscellaneous fixtures have been extremely numerous and varied. Miss Adela Verne's first-rate interpretation of Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto must be placed on record. There is no occasion, however, to dwell upon the details of the Chappell Ballad Concert Party's entertainment, which was neither better nor worse than most affairs of the kind; nor, perhaps, need we criticise Mr. Mark Hambourg's Beethoven recital, as the artist was somewhat swallowed up in the virtuoso. A week of Russian Ballet had its moments of extreme pleasure as well as periods of dullness. Unqualified interest, on the other hand, attended the farewell visit of Pachmann, who, although his performances may not be always on the same elevated plane, will long be remembered for his attributes of genius, and his few limitations forgotten. Other events deserving mention are a recital of the songs of Montague F. Phillips, given by Miss Clara Butterworth, a very charming singer; and a ballad concert by Miss Alys Bateman and party. Much commendation must be bestowed upon the violin and pianoforte recital by Madame Beatrice Langley and Mr. Herbert Fryer, when Brahms's fine D minor Sonata was excellently performed, and upon Madame Ada Crossley's orchestral concert. Lastly, the first appearance at Bournemouth, on November 15, of Isolde Menges was a triumph for the youthful violinist, her interpretation of Brahms's exacting Concerto being positively startling in its masterfulness and greatness.

A significant innovation has been made at the ordinary Saturday evening concerts in the provision of a high-class soloist: on October 25, for instance, that very artistic singer, Mr. Manitto Klitgaard, took a prominent part in the scheme.

BRISTOL.

Mr. Hubert Hunt's chamber concert at the Victoria Rooms on October 27 was specially interesting on account of the performance of Beethoven's Septet in E flat, which had not been given publicly at Bristol for many years. The players were the following: Mr. Hunt (violin), Miss Gladys Home (viola), Mr. Roger Bucknall (violoncello), Mr. Jules von Hemel (clarinet), Mr. F. T. Stephens (horn), Mr. C. Bayman (bassoon), Mr. G. Weiss (double-bass). An excellent interpretation of this fine work was forthcoming. Two Quartets, Mozart's in D and Schumann's in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1), were effectively played by Mr. Hunt and Miss Avice Sealy (violins), Miss Gladys Home (viola), and Mr. Bucknall (violoncello).

The Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society on October 30 appeared in the Shire Hall, Gloucester, on behalf of the Gloucester and District Commercial Travellers' Association. There was a large audience who, by their frequent applause manifested the gratification which they experienced. Mr. Riseley conducted the greater portion of the pieces, which included arrangements by him of two songs, 'Massa's in de cold ground' and 'The old folks at home,' sung by Miss Gertrude Winchester, with accompaniment by the choir. Dr. A. H. Brewer and Mr. C. Lee Williams directed part-songs of their own composition, which were well received.

Some organ recitals given during the month have attracted large and appreciative audiences. On November 1 Mr. Alfred Hollins gave two recitals upon the Colston Hall organ, and on November 8 Mr. George Riseley gave a recital upon the same instrument, Miss Gertrude Winchester, who possesses a rich contralto voice, contributing songs at intervals. On November 5 the monthly recital upon the organ at St. Mary Redcliffe Church was undertaken by Dr. A. H. Brewer.

In the Public Hall, Shirehampton, on November 5, the Avonmouth and Shirehampton Choral Society gave a concert under the direction of Dr. R. Vaughan Williams and Mr. P. Napier Miles, and there was a numerous attendance. The choir gave excellent performances of three Elizabethan songs by Dr. Vaughan Williams, viz., 'Sweet day,' 'Willow song,' and 'O mistress mine.' A part-song, 'Nocturne' by Mr. Napier Miles, was another successful feature. Miss Maja Kjöhlér delighted with some Swedish and English folk-songs, and Miss Dora Bright gave pianoforte solos.

By arrangement of the joint committee of the Ladies' Musical Club and the Bristol Musical Club, there was a performance by the Flonzaley String Quartet at Victoria Rooms on November 7. These fine players gave Haydn's Quartet in D (Op. 64, No. 5), Hugo Wolf's 'Italienische Serenade,' and Schubert's Quartet in D minor, and their able interpretation afforded pleasure to a large audience, who caused the composition of Hugo Wolf to be repeated.

The Bristol Choral Society, on November 15, at Colston Hall, gave their first concert of the season, and under the direction of Mr. George Riseley performed Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan' (with Miss Phyllis Lett as soloist) and Max Bruch's 'Lay of the Bell,' the principal vocalists being Miss Lilian Dillingham, Miss Lett, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Frederic Austin. The choir and orchestra numbered 500. Both works were admirably given, and were highly appreciated by a large audience.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

For their first concert of a new series of Musical Matinées, at Plymouth, on October 22, the Misses Smith arranged a visit by the English String Quartet, whose special achievement was a beautiful interpretation of Tchaikovsky's Quartet, Op. 11, though they failed to achieve an ideal interpretation of the first movement. In Schumann's Quintet they were joined by Miss Florence Smith as pianist.

A corporate festival service of Freemasons, on October 26, at St. Paul's Church, Devonport, gave opportunity for some good singing of sacred music. St. Peter's Quartet, a local combination of male voices who are gaining a reputation for beautiful tone and artistic performance, gave pieces by Gounod and Sullivan, and Mr. W. H. Stowell was heard as violoncello soloist.

Two special efforts on behalf of the sufferers of the Welsh colliery disaster were made at Plymouth on November 6 and 13. The first was a miscellaneous concert, for which the Pier Pavilion was lent by the management. So generous was the assistance given that not a farthing had to be deducted from receipts for expenses, and the sum of £44 was handed to the charity. The Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir (conductor, Mr. D. Parkes) were the promoters of a concert in the Guildhall on the latter date. They sang several pieces excellently, and also secured the services of solo artists. The profits amounted to upwards of £50.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The Dohnányi Quartet in D flat, Op. 15, was admirably played at Torquay by the Haydn String Quartet when they opened their seventh season on October 23. Beethoven was represented by No. 1 of Op. 18, and Miss Wressell Macey sang songs by Stanford. The Isca Glee Singers at Exeter on November 12 greatly pleased a large audience by the finish and expressiveness of their singing of 'Hail, smiling morn,' 'My dear mistress,' 'Fair Flora decks,' and pieces of lighter character. Solos were given by Madame Amy Shergold, Miss Edith Penville (flute), and the Singers.

Mr. Fred W. Ward gave an organ recital at Dawlish on October 23, assisted by Miss Phyllis Smith (violin), Miss Queenie Parsons, and Messrs. W. J. Berry and J. A. Gray (vocalists). 'Elijah' was performed in Torquay Wesleyan Church on October 29, by 180 performers, under the conductorship of Mr. Ernest W. Goss. The choruses were finely sung, and the principal singers were Miss Mary Leighton, Mrs. E. Fowles, Messrs. Frank Webster and G. Parker. Barnstaple Orchestral Society have instituted a series of fortnightly Saturday evening concerts. Mr. A. Hind conducts a band of forty players, and the two programmes performed up to date have been of good standard. At Marychurch, on November 12, quartets were excellently sung by Messrs. F. Hawke, T. Hillman, H. Gillam, and S. E. Kelly, at a miscellaneous concert directed by Mr. A. Pratt.

On November 14, Mrs. Herring-Mason's Operatic Society gave a performance of 'The Barber of Seville' with much success, the characters being sung by Miss Fiffine de la Côte, Miss W. Nott, Messrs. J. C. Nott, L. J. Lomax, W. J. Nicks, C. Mills, A. Pook, and N. Egbear.

At Torquay, on November 19, Mr. E. W. Goss gave a lecture-recital on 'Some modern composers and their music.'

CORNWALL.

To encourage the Wadebridge Town Prize Band two concerts were given on their behalf on October 22, the chief feature being quartet-singing by Messrs. Ennor, Drake, Crewes, and Hawke; other helpers were Miss Keen (pianoforte), Mrs. Andrews (soprano), Messrs. C. G. Pike (violinello), A. W. Latham, W. T. Lobb, and Rea, Mr. and Mrs. Savage and Miss Salmon. Looe Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. T. H. Northam, played remarkably well at their concert on October 29. Mr. Richard White conducted an excellent performance of 'Judas Maccabæus' in Penzance Wesleyan Church on October 31. The soloists were the Misses M. Cooke, M. Tonking, D. Rosewarne, D. Shakerley, and Messrs. F. W. Holman and J. Trebilcock, with Mr. W. H. Carne at the organ.

The Rev. Canon Corfe, addressing Truro Junior Clergy Society on November 5 on the subject of 'Church Music from the point of view of the parish priest,' argued that the three factors—one organist, one choir, and one congregation—must be severally severely confined to their limits of contribution to the general purpose; but he did not demonstrate how this idea could be attained.

Miss Maria Yelland (contralto) gave a concert at Mevagissey on November 6, with assistance from Miss Maud Tellam, Miss Mary Hawke, Messrs. A. Blight, A. Yelland, and W. Manshire. The Welsh colliery disaster was the object of charity at a sacred concert at Wadebridge on November 9, when the Town Band and Male Quartet were the chief performers. The cantata, 'King Harold' was sung by St. Austell Musical Society on November 13, with orchestra. Mr. S. D. Collins conducted.

DUBLIN.

The Royal Dublin Society chamber music recitals commenced for the season on Monday, November 3, with a pianoforte recital by Dr. Esposito. His programme included Beethoven's Op. 31, No. 2, Schumann's 'Carneval' and an attractive group of pieces by Alessandro and Domenico Scarlatti, Marcello, Galuppi, and Griazoli.

On November 10, Signor Simonetti, Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees, and Dr. Esposito gave a trio recital, playing works by Mozart in B flat, and Brahms in C minor (Op. 101). The programme also included Beethoven's Op. 30, No. 2, in C minor. Miss Fanny Davies gave a pianoforte recital on November 17.

At Woodbrook Concert Hall a series of Saturday afternoon concerts started on October 25. The programmes have been given by our local instrumental trio (Signor Simonetti, Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees, and Dr. Esposito), Mr. Goss Custard (organist of St. Margaret's, Westminster), and Mr. George Hewson (organist of the Chapel Royal, Dublin Castle). The organ is a beautiful instrument recently erected by the Æolian Company. Vocalists who sang were Madame Borel, Mr. Melfort Dalton, the Carlton Quartet (Miss Lilian Whittaker, Miss Edith Mortier, Mr. William Lewin, Mr. A. G. Birch), and Mr. Percy Whitehead. The Instrumental Trio, performing on alternate Saturdays, intend to play Beethoven's Trios in chronological order.

On November 16 the ninth season of the Sunday orchestral concerts began in the Antient Concert Rooms. The programmes included Beethoven's fourth and Mozart's G minor Symphonies.

The Sackville Hall Saturday popular concerts organized by Mr. Robert Harrison and Mr. Sealy Jeffares are in full swing, and cater for large audiences at prices ranging from threepence to one shilling for admission.

EDINBURGH.

The outstanding event of the past month was the visit of the Hallé Orchestra, under the conductorship of Michael Balling. Two concerts were given by this combination of players, and these formed the first of the Classical Series of concerts arranged by Mr. Simpson. On November 3 a Wagner programme was planned, to give an idea of Wagner's growth as a composer. The Symphony in C was introduced to the Edinburgh public at this concert, and had a cordial reception. The 'Rienzi,' 'Faust,' and 'Meistersinger' Overtures, the Prelude from 'Tristan,' the Bacchanale from 'Tannhäuser,' and the 'Siegfried Idyll,' completed the programme.

On November 4 a classical programme was submitted. The fifth Symphony of Beethoven and a Spohr Concerto, with Miss Menges as soloist, were the chief items. Brilliant is the only term applicable to the success of this venture, as the bringing of this band to Edinburgh may be called.

Paterson's Orchestral Concerts opened on the succeeding week under Mlynarski as conductor (for the fourth year). On November 10 Elman was the attraction in the Beethoven Concerto, and the chief orchestral item was Elgar's 'Enigma Variations.' On November 17, a Wagner-Tchaikovsky evening was given, with Reger's Concerto for orchestra opening the programme. Ellen Beck was vocalist in the Wagnerian excerpts.

Rosenthal was entirely responsible for the third Classical Concert on November 15.

A record of musical happenings would be incomplete without reference to Pachmann's farewell recital on November 12, Miss Jean Waterston's vocal recital on October 25, Miss Agnes Copland's violin recital on October 30, and the first University Historical concert on October 29.

An event which is not without an important bearing on musical education and appreciation, was the lecture demonstration of Jaques-Dalcroze on November 15, in the Heriot Hall, under the auspices of the Musical Education Society, with Prof. Niecks as chairman. There was a large audience, and a considerable waking up to the importance of education in matters musical may result from the discussion which this visit has produced.

GLASGOW.

The first of Mr. A. M. Henderson's chamber concerts on October 30 took the form of a vocal and pianoforte recital in which the concert-giver had the co-operation of Dr. Georg Henschel as singer. One cannot conceive of anything more artistic than Dr. Henschel's singing to his own pianoforte accompaniment, and on this occasion his interpretation of ten contrasted songs, with Loewe's ballad, 'Edward,' as a climax, was inimitable. Mr. Henderson played three groups of pianoforte solos, one of the most interesting being the performer's own Pianoforte transcription of five numbers from Bach's organ-works and chamber-music.

The Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society having been in abeyance for a year, have decided to join forces with the Western Amateur Orchestra, a body who have been coming to the front during the few years of their existence. The amalgamation is popular on both sides, and is likely to lead to a revived interest in orchestral playing. The new orchestra will adopt the name of the older Society, and Mr. H. W. Cole will act as conductor.

The Choral and Orchestral Union's season opened auspiciously on October 11, when the Scottish Orchestra and M. Emil Mlynarski received a cordial reception from an audience which completely filled St. Andrew's Hall. The personnel of the Orchestra is practically the same as last year, and their playing at the opening concert was a foretaste of joys to come during the season. M. Mischa Elman, who was soloist, gave a performance of Beethoven's Violin concerto which conferred a note of distinction upon the concert. The other orchestral numbers were Weber's 'Jubilee' Overture, Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations (capitally played), and Glazounoff's 'Carneval' Overture. As indicated, the coming season promises to be a highly successful one, for it begins with a much-increased subscription list, and the Orchestra's list of outside engagements is quite full. The City Corporation have engaged the Orchestra for six 'People's' concerts as against four last year, and it is rumoured that if these are sufficiently supported a further extension may be made next year. The first of the Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts, on November 15, was truly a popular one in respect of programme, but one novelty—Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1, was given for the first time. Miss Rhoda Von Glehn was solo vocalist.

M. Pachmann's farewell recital took place on November 14, when that eccentric artist delighted a large audience with his Chopin interpretations.

The second classical concert on November 18 marked the centenary of Wagner's birth, and appropriately, the programme was wholly composed of the Bayreuth master's works. In soprano excerpts Miss Ellen Beck confirmed the very favourable impression she made formerly at these concerts.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The Tchaikovsky concert of the Philharmonic Society on October 28 was remarkable for the impressive performance directed by M. Safonoff of the 'Pathetic Symphony,' of which, as a work inscribed to him, his knowledge is intimate and illuminating. M. Safonoff has materially increased his reputation here as a conductor of first-rate powers, and not only in Tchaikovsky's music. He brought with him a splendidly-equipped violoncello player in M. Belousoff, of Moscow, whose artistic reputation was fully maintained in the 'Rococo Variations' in A, Op. 33. The choral feature of the evening was the 'Hymn to the Trinity,' which was beautifully sung under Mr. Harry Evans's direction.

The presence of Signor Busoni at the third concert on November 11 gave a strong personal interest to the programme, to which he contributed in a three-fold capacity as solo pianist, composer, and conductor. It was in the first of these rôles that Busoni appeared to chief advantage, and his performance of Beethoven's C minor Pianoforte concerto, in which the orchestra was conducted by Mr. Harry Evans, was marked by the highest features of musicianship, as well as by a technique of extraordinary masterfulness. His individuality as a player was further exhibited in the Andantino from Mozart's ninth Concerto as arranged for pianoforte solo without orchestra. Signor Busoni directed his 'Lustspiel' Overture, a clever, brisk piece, avowedly in the Mozartian manner, and as conductor of Mozart's G minor Symphony he appeared to advantage in an unaffected reading which gave general satisfaction. Miss Tilly Koenen, who was accompanied by Mr. Bennett North, sang earnestly in songs by Schubert and Brahms. The choral-singing in Brahms's 'Lullaby' was a delightful feature of the programme. Mr. Harry Evans can best explain how the sopranos commanded such a beautiful tone, and that in passages which chiefly lie high. There was no mistaking the sincerity of the encore—a rare compliment as regards the choir.

The Pachmann 'Farewell' recital in the Philharmonic Hall, on October 25, drew a crowded audience, who found the eminent pianist in full possession of all his powers as an executant and humorist.

The new series of Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra concerts began on November 4 in the Philharmonic Hall, when Mr. Vasco Akeroyd conducted a programme of music, 'popular' in the best sense, for it included Schubert's B minor 'Unfinished' Symphony, the 'William Tell' Overture, brilliantly played, and Luigini's 'Ballet Suite.' Any disappointment occasioned by the non-appearance of the violinist Melsa, owing to a damaged finger, was fully alleviated by the playing of M. Zacharewitsch, who at short notice undertook the Paganini D major Concerto and Bach E major Concerto originally set down in the programme, both of which works he played with easy mastery and abundant expression. Interest was also added to a successful concert by the singing of Miss Dorothy Silk. From the dimensions of the audience it appeared that Mr. Akeroyd has gained new supporters as well as retained old subscribers.

At the second concert of the Rodewald Club on October 27 the programme was sustained by Miss Helen Anderton (vocalist), and Mr. Vivian Burrows (violinist). At the third concert, on November 10, the Fransella Trio, which consists of Mr. Albert Fransella, the well-known flautist, Miss Marjorie Hayward (violinist), and Miss Winifred Christie (pianist), collaborated in Bach's Trio Sonata in G, Purcell's MS. Trio, César Cui's new Suite, Op. 56, and a Trio by Eugene Goossens.

A concert which interested a large circle was given in St. George's Hall on November 12 by Mr. Alfred Ross (violin), Miss Marguerite Stilwell (Mrs. A. Ross) (pianoforte), and Miss Ethel Penhall (vocalist). Miss Penhall's songs included examples by Ernest Austin, F. C. Nicholls, and Jane McConnan, of whom the last two are local composers, professional and amateur respectively. The song accompaniments were played by Miss Charlotte Davies.

At the meeting of the Liverpool and District Organists' and Choirmasters' Association on November 3, an address on 'Bye-paths of Musical History' was given by Mr. James T. Lightwood, editor of The Choir, in the course of which reminiscences were introduced of local musicians, including Mr. W. T. Best. This incomparable organist provides an oft-recurring theme of local interest, for he had an extremely keen and nervous sensibility which was sometimes a trial even to its possessor, and was certainly not always a delight to his friends. His reputation as a master of sarcasm and caustic wit is sustained by bons mots and anecdotes which should afford material for an entertaining chapter in his biography if this ever comes to be written.

Although Liverpool did not provide whole-hearted support to the week's Beecham-Denhof Operatic Festival which opened on October 27, there was certainly no lack of appreciation displayed by those who attended the splendid performances given in the Shakespeare Theatre. But a really good response was made as regards the less expensive seats, and it is probable that had better-known operas been given there would have been crowded audiences. It is really lamentable that the financial loss on the week ran into four figures, but it is chiefly due to the production of two absolutely unknown operas, 'Rosenkavalier' and 'Pelléas and Mélisande' (as well as 'The Magic Flute,' which is practically unknown to the present generation). It is no use blinking the fact that Liverpool, as elsewhere in the provinces, is not vitally concerned with the very latest developments of modern opera. Mr. Beecham was unfortunately prevented by indisposition from taking part in the seven performances, which included two of 'Rosenkavalier' and one each of 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'The Magic Flute,' 'Pelléas and Mélisande,' 'Orpheus,' and 'The Flying Dutchman.' Mr. Beecham's absence was particularly regretted in the case of Debussy's opera, although M. Schilling-Ziemssen's careful direction of an interesting first performance must not be overlooked. He was naturally more temperamentally suited to 'Rosenkavalier,' as was M. Emil Kreuz in the direction of Mozart's 'The Magic Flute.'

There are indeed but few reservations in the chorus or universal praise regarding the representations. Well-known singers sustained high reputations in the cases of Miss Agnes Nicholls and Madame Gleeson-White, and both ladies exhibited dramatic abilities in keeping with their vocal powers. The same can be said about Mr. Walter Hyde, Mr. Frank Mullings, a valuable recruit to the opera stage, and also Mr. Charles Knowles, while Mr. Frederick Ranalow achieved new fame both histrionic as well as vocal. Mr. Arthur Pacyna was excellently cast as Baron Ochs in 'Rosenkavalier,' and Mr. Robert Radford is accounted the best King Mark we have seen here. Among other gifted and capable artists mention should be made of Miss Beryl Freeman, in the part of Mélisande.

Coleridge-Taylor's masterpiece, 'The Song of Hiawatha,' exactly suits the Welsh Choral Union, for its human interest, humour, tenderness, and tragedy appeal to the ardent Celtic temperament, which Mr. Harry Evans knows so well how to govern. Their latest performance of the work on November 15 was limited to Parts I. and II., and if the note of certainty and exaltation was not so sustained as in the memorable first performance when the music had the charm of novelty, it was an unmistakably fine example of choral interpretation. The soloists were Miss L. Evans Williams, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Charles Tree. The miscellaneous items included a Motet by Cyril Jenkins, an earnest and expressive setting of Longfellow's 'Blessed are the dead.' Smoothly written, and beautifully sung by the unaccompanied voices, it made a favourable impression. The Welsh Choral Union are now engaged in the preparation of Prof. Granville Bantock's new choral work, 'The Vanity of Vanities.' At their final concert on March 28, Brahms's 'Requiem' will be sung.

The first of the series of three concerts by the Warrington Musical Society was given in the Parr Hall, on November 12, when Mr. Percy Fletcher's 'The Deacon's Masterpiece' ('The wonderful one-hoss shay') was sung under the direction of Mr. Frank H. Crossley, with Miss Eva Rich and Mr. Norman Allin as principal soloists. Choral works now in preparation include Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan' and Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang.'

A performance of 'Elijah' was given by the Port Sunlight Philharmonic and Orchestral Society in the Gladstone Hall, Port Sunlight, on October 30, under the direction of Mr. Seddon. The vocal principals were Miss Edina Thraves, Miss Georgina Phillips, Mr. Herbert Pope, and Mr. Samuel Mann.

At Mr. Akeroyd's third Symphony Orchestra concert, on November 18, the programme included Dvořák's 'From the New World' Symphony, Cowen's Overture, 'The butterfly's ball,' and Grieg's Pianoforte concerto in A, Op. 16, in which the boy-pianist, Solomon, appeared as soloist.

A performance of Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' was given under the auspices of the Sunday Society in St. George's Hall, on November 16, by the Liverpool Ladies' Choir and Liverpool Vocal Union of male voices. As conductor of these well-trained choral bodies, Madame Fanny de Bouffiers worthily fills a high place, which she has won by her own abilities. Her Choral Societies have specialized in Gounod's beautiful work, and in previous performances have set up a high standard which they sustained on the occasion referred to. In the Mass, the soloists were Madame Annie Goodwin, Mr. Lloyd Moore, and Mr. Ralph Smith, an excellent trio of local singers. In conducting various orchestral items Madame Fanny de Bouffiers displayed natural force and command. There was a large audience, as is usual at these popular Sunday evening functions.

The Liverpool Symphonic Society, of which Mr. E. Malcolm Kelly is conductor, gave an invitation lecture-rehearsal on November 20, when the subject was 'The illumining power of Music.'

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Writing in April last, at the close of Michael Balling's first season, I hazarded the view that quite probably the future would reveal the fact that Balling's worth to Manchester, at this juncture in its musical life, had been in directions other than that of being conductor of the Hallé Society. Too late for publication in my last month's notes, it was announced that the Hallé Executive had offered the Manchester City Council the services of the Hallé Orchestra, under Balling's conductorship, for the experimental purposes of two Corporation concerts in the Town Hall at prices of 6d. or 3d., or perhaps free of charge, so as to enable the poorer people who have a love of good music to attend. The Hallé Society's fee for both these concerts would be £105, Balling giving his services, this amount being not more than one-third of the sum which in ordinary circumstances, and exclusive of the conductor's fee, would have to be paid for two such concerts. Balling's democratic sympathies are pretty well known, and his experiences as an adjudicator at Blackpool Festival last October would merely confirm him in his view that the future of music in this country lies with the masses rather than with the moneyed classes.

Of course the City Council had advisers who bade it pause before consenting to such an unfair undercutting of other local enterprises (which are out for profit, be it noted, as the Hallé body is not). Mr. Brand Lane focussed these views in a strongly-worded letter to the local Press. The main difficulty confronting these practically 'free' Municipal orchestral concerts will be to see that the right class of people (for whom they are intended) get there, and are not crowded out by those who can well afford to pay 1s. or 2s. 6d. for a Hallé or other orchestral concert. By holding them on the half-day closing, Wednesday, a class of person will be reached for whom orchestral concerts of any sort are an utter impossibility owing to the conditions of their business life. Notwithstanding Mr. Brand Lane's very natural line of argument, all who take a long view of matters would agree that such things are entirely desirable, and, well handled, can only bring great ultimate good to the city's higher life. It was gratifying to find the full Council confirm the recommendation of its sub-committee.

On the top of this came Beecham and the Denhof Company to give Manchester a chance of rehabilitating herself in the eyes of the musical world. Downcast as we all felt last month, it may, after all, prove to have been a case of reculer pour mieux sauter. Anyhow, 'Rosenkavalier' and 'Meistersinger' packed the Theatre Royal to suffocation, and the 'Ring' dramas drew audiences which closely approached these crowds. But even so, it was not possible to clear the expenses, still less show a profit, which proves that the first essential to success is a bigger theatre, where 7s. 6d. and not 12s. 6d. would be the charge for a best seat. At the time of the Denhof débâcle Beecham had been very caustic in his remarks on 'musical Manchester'; his experiences between November 3 and 8 were such as to lead him to relent somewhat, to take back most of the hard things he then said, and even to suggest that a month's opera on a co-operative basis was quite feasible. It would cost, he estimated, £2,500 per week—say £10,000 for the month. He was willing to guarantee £5,000 if Manchester would find a like amount, and they would share half-and-half in management, Balling being a co-director; and he hoped the Hallé band might be available for such a purpose. If the plan were carried out, it would probably prove a source of income to the Society by the engagement of its players. Recent developments in Municipal affairs show that we are far from any City subsidy. In Germany it is usually found that the aristocracy back opera; here the moneyed men of commerce must be looked to for support. Given that, and a theatre capable of holding an audience twice as big as the Theatre Royal at prices within the means of moderate purses, and we should be in a fair way to solve the operatic problem.

I understand that Mr. Beecham's project is making satisfactory progress, as he met the conductor, secretary, and chairman of the Hallé Society on November 13, and the Hallé attitude may be described as quite sympathetic. Although a period roughly coinciding with the first month of Lent, 1914, has been mentioned, no definite and final arrangements have been made, but it is certain that the venue will not be the Theatre Royal. Probably before this journal is published a meeting of Manchester citizens will have been held to meet Sir Joseph and Mr. Thomas Beecham. It is most gratifying to find the Hallé executive disposed to take the initiative, as they are the natural leaders in the musical life of the city.

Few people here knew anything of Beecham's powers as a conductor, but those few were compelled to acknowledge that his reading of the 'Ring' dramas, his supple resource equal to all emergencies, the perfect command of all his forces, far surpassed their highest expectations.

Warm appreciation of the orchestral playing must not make us oblivious of some equally brilliant singing.

Hans Bechstein's work as Mimmy (to adopt G. B. Shaw's good Anglicisation) is well worth of ranking with that of Hans Breuer. The eloquence of wind and cloud and the heroic pathos of Brünnhilde's leave-taking made the 'Walküre' very memorable. We left her sleeping as Agnes Nicholls, but she awoke as Gleeson-White. Although there is considerable disparity in their vocal purity, one could not doubt that the sheer intellectuality of Gleeson-White's work—and the same is true of Austin as Wotan and Wanderer—must eventually place these artists on the highest plane as Wagnerian singers. There was, however, one conspicuous instance of all voice and little brain that served to drive home the lesson that Wagner-dramas all possess an epic quality and must be served by intellects of a commanding scale. But in Messrs. Knowles, Maitland, Hyde, Lewys James, Ranalow, Blamey, and Mullings, and Misses Beeley, Cooper, Hine, and Muriel Terry, we are seeing the evolution of a group of younger Wagnerian singers who will be uncommonly useful in the day that is dawning for opera.

In the week preceding these Wagner-dramas we had two Acts of 'Parsifal,' under Balling, in the Free Trade Hall, where John Coates proved that he is quite ready for 'Parsifal' at Covent Garden (or anywhere else) next February. The whole reading was spiritualised in a very intense way. The glory and rapture of the Good Friday music will surely never fade from the memory. This continuous drenching in Wagnerian music (space forbids any mention of 'Die Meistersinger') needed a big work even for relief, and Strauss's witty 'Rosenkavalier,' under Schilling-Ziemssen, was a perfect foil. Here Mesdames Agnes Nicholls, Caroline Hatchard, and Elizabeth Schiller, and Mr. Arthur Pacyna, bore away the palm. How the first-named conveyed the pathetic beauty of the Indian summer of woman's life (at the close of Act I) must be seen and heard to be believed. It came to most Manchester musicians as an astounding revelation. The Baron Ochs of Pacyna was an admirable feature. In Mr. Gura, Messrs. Denhof and Beecham possess a stage-producer of exceptional genius.

The 'Rosenkavalier' performance quite denuded the usual Hallé concert audience on the same evening; rather unfortunately too, as the important Bruckner Symphony No. 3 was played in a manner which aroused more enthusiasm than any other performance of his work at Manchester. Its nobility was at once evident, but that could not compensate for its generally somewhat threadbare character. Why Miss Tilly Koenen elected to sing Schubert's 'Der Hirt auf dem Felsen' to a pianoforte rather than to an orchestral accompaniment passes comprehension. The fifth Hallé concert, on November 13, was chiefly of interest on account of Jacques Thibaud's first appearance in association with the orchestra, introducing us to Chausson's Poem for violin and orchestra (never played here before). Since Elgar's Concerto, Manchester has heard no new violin music which reaches such lofty heights. On this occasion, too, Holbrooke's 'Queen Mab' music (with choral ending) was given for the first time, and, in an evening of distinguished orchestral music, stood forth brilliantly. The Verdi 'Requiem' had not been sung here for over twenty years, so its reappearance as a 'centenary' offering to the composer's memory, on November 20, was more than usually fitting.

The month brought some uncommonly interesting chamber concerts, and pride of place must go to the three great-nieces of Joachim, the Misses von Aranyi, who came to the second Gentlemen's Concert on November 12. Bach's C minor Concerto for two violins (the accompaniment to which was given in a specially-written pianoforte arrangement) was a wonderful presentment of perfectly-matched styles in noble music. The Spohr Duet in concerto form, for two violins alone, brought back to memory the days when Joachim and Lady Hallé bewitched us by its grace.

Ill luck dogged the first Bowdon chamber concert, for in turn Szegedi, Thibaud, and Hamilton Harty fell out of the scheme, Mr. O'Connor Morris taking the latter's place and Zacharewitsch being the violinist. The London party of wind-players who have before visited various Lancashire centres joined Mr. Morris in Beethoven and Mozart Quintets, -solos on the various wind-instruments lending diversity to the programme.

The opening Brodsky Quartet concert brought Miss Tina Lerner in a new rôle; in the Dvorák Pianoforte quartet she proved herself one of the elect who are as great in chamber ensemble music as in the bigger forms of the art. But the great thing of the afternoon was the Brahms G major Sextet.

The Manchester Vocal Society got to work on November 12 with Bach, Delius, Holbrooke, and the early madrigalians. Mr. Whittaker has left the olden-time Vocal Society programmes miles behind. It may be a moot point whether its audiences have travelled as quickly as his choir; the reception accorded to an occasional mid-Victorian piece of music would suggest a 'hankerin' arter' the tuney songs of our very early manhood.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The city and district owe a deep debt of gratitude to Mr. Beecham for his enterprise in presenting the Denhof Operatic Festival performances at the Theatre Royal from November 10 to 15. As the attendance was not so good as the merits of the scheme deserved, it is to be feared that Newcastle also owes Mr. Beecham something in current coin of the realm. The performances reached a higher standard than anything we have hitherto heard in the North, especially in regard to the orchestra. The operas produced were 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'The Magic Flute,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' 'Elektra,' 'The Rosebearer' ('Der Rosenkavalier'), 'The Mastersingers,' and 'Orpheus,' the last at a matinée on the Saturday. Details are unnecessary, as the performers are all so well known and have already been chronicled. The sensation of the week was Mr. Frank Mullings's fine performance of the part of Tristan. He is well known on the concert platform here, and his début in opera was looked forward to with keen anticipation. The result was a triumph for English operatic art. Another event that should be chronicled was the appearance of Madame Gleeson-White as Senta in 'The Flying Dutchman'—a part which she took at short notice, to replace Miss Agnes Nicholls, who was unable to appear. Mr. Frederic Austin also did splendid work during the week, being equally good in tragedy and comedy. Mr. Frederick Ranalow was another singer who created a favourable impression. 'Elektra,' as usual, provoked endless discussion, but 'Der Rosenkavalier' drew one of the biggest houses of the week and was hailed with delight by everybody. The house was filled on the Saturday evening, when 'The Mastersingers' was produced. It was altogether a memorable event for Newcastle, and proved conclusively that some of our English singers have both voice and dramatic instinct equal to any demands that operatic art can make upon them.

The Gelsolo Quartet, of Paris, gave the second concert of the Darlington Chamber Music Society on October 30, in the Mechanics' Hall. There was a large attendance, and great enthusiasm on the part of the audience. The players were remarkable for their perfect ensemble, fine rhythmic powers, and the clarity of their phrasing. Debussy's Quartet in G minor, Beethoven's C sharp minor Quartet (Op. 131), and Mozart's Quartet in D minor (No. 13), formed the programme.

On Wednesday, October 29, in the Market Hall, Richmond, Yorks, the Yorkshire Permanent Orchestra, under Mr. Julian Clifford, gave a concert at which a large and fashionable audience was present. The programme included Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, Mozart's second Rhapsody, the 'Theme and Variations' from Tchaikovsky's third Suite, and a fine 'Valse de Concert' of Glazounoff. Miss Groschel, of Richmond, played the solo part in Mendelssohn's 'Capriccio Brillante' with clear technique and beautiful tone. The concert had been promoted by Lady Evelyn James, who takes the greatest interest in the musical development of the district. On Wednesday, November 12, the first concert, of the present season, for young people was given at Polam Hall School in the evening. The programme was provided by Mr. Albert Fransella (flute), Miss Hélène Dolmetsch (viola da gamba and violoncello), and Miss Dorothy Moggridge (pianoforte), with Mr. T. Henderson as Lecturer. A brief outline of the history of the instruments was given, and Mr. Fransella and Miss Dolmetsch then displayed to the young people their various technical and tonal powers. The illustrations were a Trio for flute, gamba, and pianoforte by Leclair, a Prelude (unaccompanied), and 'Divisions on a ground' for viola da gamba solo, by Christopher Symphon, Handel's Flute sonata in A minor, Bach's Sonata in G minor for viola da gamba, two Scarlatti pieces for pianoforte solo, and a Boccherini Sonata in G for violoncello. This programme had also been given in the afternoon at the Training College by kind permission of the principal, Miss Hawtrey.

Mr. C. J. Bishenden gave another of his lecture-concerts on November 18, at 105, New Oxford Street. On this occasion his subject was 'Sir Henry Bishop,' who was born on November 18, 1786.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

A good house supported the concert given by Miss Elsie Johnson and Miss Dorothy Foulds on October 22, at Calvert's Café, Nottingham, when the former showed herself a pianist of distinct promise, and the latter, although hindered by a cold, revealed considerable ability as a vocalist.

The lectures on 'The development of the string quartet,' given by Mr. Allen Gill at the University College, proved of increasing interest. The first, on October 23, entitled 'Apt for voices and viols,' covered a long period; the illustrations, mainly choral, were very numerous and similar, no less than seven examples being taken from the works of Dowland. The second, on October 30, gave more scope both to the lecturer and the performers. The examples included movements from Quartets by Haydn, and Mozart's Quartet in D minor in its entirety.

The series was concluded on November 13, when the works of Beethoven and Mendelssohn were drawn upon. The subject of the lecture and the examples were ably treated and proved highly interesting. It should be mentioned that the vocal illustrations at the first lecture were given by members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and the instrumental items by Mr. F. Mountney, Miss Una Truman, Mrs. Marshall, and Mr. Edwin Thorpe. Much interest was taken in these lectures, and further researches in the realm of chamber music would prove a welcome and a useful subject for future discourse. On October 21 an interesting sonata recital was given by Mr. Edwin Thorpe (violin) and Mr. John Cullen (piano), when an interesting programme included Sonatas by Brahms in E minor (Op. 38), Grieg in A minor (Op. 36), and Rubinstein in D major (Op. 18).

The Sacred Harmonic Society opened their season with a fine performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' on November 6. The solos were given by Madame Gleeson-White, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Stewart Gardner. The choral-singing was especially fine in the ballad, 'The guests were loud,' 'A little bird in the air,' and in the Epilogue. Included in the programme were Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' which were received with great warmth, the performance being all that could be desired. Pachmann's 'farewell' visit took place on November 10, when he played to a monster house at the Mechanics' Hall.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

Mr. Granville Bantock's new Suite for string orchestra, 'Scenes from the Scottish Highlands,' was given its first performance at the Sheffield Promenade Concerts in the Albert Hall on November 18. The distinguished composer has from the first institution of these orchestral concerts shown a keen interest in their scope, namely, the provision of orchestral music by a thoroughly-equipped orchestra in a district where, in the cultivation of choral music, other branches of musical activity are somewhat overshadowed. This interest has taken a practical form in the composition for the concerts of his new Suite and his personal attendance to direct its first performance.

The Suite is in five movements. They comprise a Strathspey ('The Braes o' Tullymet'); Dirge ('The Isle of Mull'); Quickstep ('Inverness Gathering'); Gaelic Melody ('Baloo, baloo'); and Reel ('The De'il amang the Tailors').

The Suite is the outcome of a recent visit by the composer to Scotland, where he heard indigenous tunes played at musical gatherings, generally in two-part and very primitive harmony and progressions. He conceived the idea of embodying these experiences in a permanent form, and with a nucleus of such suggestive material plus his own resourceful musicianship and free-handed scoring, has produced a Suite of considerable musical value and obvious attractiveness. The Dirge, though the shortest, is one of the finest sections. It is graphic music, recording the impression of a visit to Mull, and is veritably a sea-picture. Solo violin, viola, and cello are used against the full mass of strings (muted) with striking effect. The Gaelic Melody, a slow, crooning song, is the most modern in feeling as it is the most sensuously beautiful of the divisions of the Suite. The lively movements are piquantly scored, and the entire composition is of varied interest and likely to become generally popular. The composer directed a smart performance, and was several times enthusiastically recalled. At the same concert Mr. J. A. Rodgers directed a performance of the 'Eroica' Symphony in which the orchestra surpassed its previous best, and Miss Yvonne Astruc played Bach's Violin concerto in A minor in superlatively artistic style. Miss Helen Blain was the vocalist.

A well-planned series of chamber concerts, organized by Miss Marie Foxon, was inaugurated on November 4, when the Flonzaley Quartet were heard in Dvorák's Quartet (Op. 61), Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 4, and Sammartini's 'Sonata à tre' for two violins and cello. The refinement of the tone and the polished ensemble of the quartet party were their chief merits, and gave infinite pleasure. The large audience indicated reviving interest in chamber music in the city.

M. de Pachmann's farewell recital found the Albert Hall with every seat sold, and large audiences have attended a week's representations of 'Iolanthe' by the Croft Hall Operatic Society, conducted by Mr. W. H. Dawn.

Sir Edward Elgar's 'The Music Makers' was given its first performance at Sheffield on November 20. To Dr. Coward and the Sheffield Musical Union is due the introduction to the district of so interesting a work. Both choir and conductor evidently approached their task in the spirit of earnestness and sympathy which the peculiar introspectiveness of the poem and music demands. The choir sang with great refinement of style, the control and reticence of their singing in the quiet reflective passages giving to the music an added significance and intimacy. More vigour at the climaxes would have enhanced the point of their singing—truly a curious reproach to bring against the Musical Union. The need for a combined rehearsal of choir and orchestra is imperative in Elgar's involved works, and this, it is understood, was not in this instance possible. In a fine performance of Sir Hubert Parry's 'Job,' the choir touched their own high-water mark. The soloists were Miss Lucy Nuttall, Master D. Sadler, Mr. Henry Brearley, Mr. Herbert Heyner, and Mr. William Hayle. Dr. Coward conducted, Mr. J. H. Parkes led the orchestra, and Mr. W. S. Jessop was organist.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

Leeds has just undergone a surfeit of good music in the Festival and the Denhof opera season, both of which occurred in October, while at the end of November a three weeks' 'Repertory Theatre' season has been making an insistent appeal to the more cultured section of the community. All these things have been against the ordinary concert enterprises, and though the number of concerts has been considerable, it is to be feared that some of the more important will have a reduced subscription list to contend with. The opening concerts of the two principal Societies have certainly been poorly attended, save in the cheaper seats, though their programmes were interesting enough. On November 12, at the first of the Leeds Philharmonic concerts, the Hallé Orchestra, under Mr. Balling, was heard in Schumann's Symphony in B flat, played with a suitable lightness of touch, and Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' which made a distinct impression. The choir were heard in Bach's eight-part motet, 'Come, Jesu, come' (conducted by Mr. Fricker), and Beethoven's not very characteristic or interesting 'Calm sea and prosperous voyage.' The Leeds Choral Union, on November 11, repeated, again with the help of the Sheffield Musical Union, Bantock's choral Symphony, 'Atalanta in Calydon,' under Dr. Coward's direction. Though it did not surpass the performances of last spring, and in some points seemed hardly equal to them, it was a notable effort, and the movement for female voices only was very charmingly sung. The programme was made up with some choruses from 'Israel in Egypt' (sung with organ accompaniment), and Mr. Frederick Dawson's very brilliant pianoforte-playing. On November 8, at the first of the Saturday Orchestral Concerts,—organized last season in continuation of the Municipal Concerts, which the Municipal authorities dis-established,—Miss Fanny Davies appeared for the first time, strange to say, as soloist at an orchestral concert at Leeds, and played the Schumann Concerto in her highly-sympathetic and artistic fashion. Smetana's 'Vltava,' Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and Sibelius's 'Karelia' Suite were also in the programme, and were effectively played by the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fricker's direction. Another series of 'Saturday Popular Concerts,' organized by Mr. Julian Clifford, began its second season on October 25 with a Wagner programme, Mr. Robert Charlesworth being the vocalist. On November 5 the Leeds Bohemian Concerts—among the few that can boast of increased support—began their fifteenth season, and introduced a String trio by Akimenko—said to be for the first time in this country, an exceedingly well-written work for a difficult combination of instruments. Chausson's beautiful Piano-forte quartet, and Schumann's more familiar work of the same kind, made up the programme, and were well played by Messrs. Herbert Johnson (piano-forte) and Cohen, Miss Lily Simms, and Mr. Hemingway. On October 28, at one of Messrs. Haddock's 'Musical Evenings,' Miss Pauline Sant Angelo gave a piano-forte recital; and on November 10 Moriz Rosenthal gave a recital, the 'Appassionata' Sonata, Schubert's Fantasia in G (a masterly interpretation), and Brahms's 'Paganini' Variations being outstanding features in his programme. At the second of the Musical Evenings, on November 18, Mr. Theodore Byard gave a vocal recital.

BRADFORD.

The Bradford Subscription Concerts are in the happy position of having a 'full house' always assured them, since the first and second seats are entirely appropriated by subscribers. At the concert on October 31 Mr. Balling conducted the greater part of the second and third Acts of 'Parsifal' (the same selection he introduced at Manchester last season). Madame Gleeson-White and Mr. John Coates were again excellent representatives of Kundry and Parsifal; Mr. Knowles was the Klingsor and Gurnemann, and Mr. Robert Maitland the Amfortas. The Bradford Festival Choral Society and the Hallé Orchestra took part in a performance which, good as it was, did not quite convince one that 'Parsifal' could be made really effective in the concert-room. On November 1 the Bradford Permanent Orchestra opened their twenty-second season, Mr. Fricker being on this occasion the conductor, and introducing Saint-Saëns's Piano-forte concerto in G minor, a work which well suits Mr. Frederick Dawson, who played the solo part with all the brilliance and piquancy it demands. On November 12 the Bradford Old Choral Society, conducted by Mr. E. J. Pickles, gave Bantock's early work, 'The Fire-worshippers,' with Miss Esta d'Argo, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Montague Borwell as soloists. The choral-singing was characterized by freshness and precision, and reached a high level of excellence. A chamber concert on November 14, at which Beethoven's String quartet in C minor (Op. 18, No. 4) was played by Mr. Kefer, Miss Friedman, Mr. Campbell, and Mrs. A. T. Priestman, concludes the record of Bradford's activity during the month.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Huddersfield Choral Society, under Dr. Coward, began their season on October 31 with Bantock's 'Christ in the Wilderness,' announced, by a singular misunderstanding, as a 'new work.' It was first performed at Gloucester Festival six years ago, and has since been heard at Sheffield. Miss Esta d'Argo, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Julien Henry were the principals in a performance of which the powerful singing of the choir was the chief feature. Elgar's 'King Olaf' was also in the programme. At the Wakefield Chamber Concert, on November 5, the Arthur Catterall String Quartet were heard in works by Mozart, Schubert, and Novacek, and Miss Alys Gear was the vocalist. On November 10, Miss Vera Dawson, an Ilkley pianist, gave a chamber concert at Ilkley, with the assistance of the Ellenberger Quartet, the programme including works by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Goldmark, an interesting feature being a Sonata for two violins and violoncello by the early Veronese composer, Dall' Abaco. Miss Edleston's singing added to the enjoyment of the audience. At Harrogate, on November 15, Messrs. Lloyd, Hartley, and Cohen gave a chamber concert at which they played Sonatas for piano-forte and violin, Mr. Hayle being the vocalist.

For the first of the subscription concerts, Mr. Balling and the Hallé Orchestra visited Hull on October 29, the programme including Beethoven's C minor Symphony and Liszt's Piano-forte concerto in E flat, with Mr. Frederick Dawson as soloist. The familiar 'Tannhäuser' Overture, which ended the concert, furnished the finest orchestral performance of the evening. On November 14 the Hull Harmonic Society, under Mr. Walter Porter, gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' trilogy, with Miss Eva Rich, Mr. Webster Millar, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth as principals, who contributed materially to the excellence of a broad and expressive performance of the work, and on November 18 the Hull Vocal Society, under Dr. E. H. Smith, gave a concert of unaccompanied choral music.

The Mather Subscription Concert, on October 30, was sustained by three young artists, Miss Phyllis Eyre (violin), Miss Ruth Eyre (piano-forte), and Mr. Gordon Cleather (baritone), who afforded a very enjoyable programme, the interest of which was sustained without having recourse to the sensations of virtuosity.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BATH.—The Avon Vale Musical Society, which forms a choir of over eighty voices, gave a successful concert at the Assembly Rooms on November 12 under the direction of Mr. J. S. Liddle. Excellent performances were presented of Gade's 'Spring's Message' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' A notable interpretation of the latter work was further distinguished by the solo-singing of Mr. Plunket Greene. The other soloists of the concert were Mr. J. P. Prior (vocalist) and Mrs. Arthur Stothert (violinist).

CARDIFF.—The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company occupied the New Theatre from October 20 to 25, and gave two performances of 'The Magic-Flute,' and one each of 'Carmen,' 'Faust,' 'Il Trovatore,' 'The Jewels of the Madonna,' and 'Maritana.'—A violin recital, on October 28, by Mischa Elman (assisted by Miss Alice Lakin and Percy B. Kahn) was a great success.—The Cardiff Harmonic Society gave a concert at the Park Hall on November 1, and the proceeds were given to the Senghenyd Disaster Fund.—The Lord Mayor of Cardiff, on November 5, gave a civic reception to the members of the Cardiff Harmonic Society at the City Hall, when Mr. Roderick Williams, the conductor, was presented with the trophy won at the Abergavenny National Eisteddfod in the chief competition, and the members of the Society with suitable mementoes (gold brooches to the ladies and pendants to the gentlemen) in commemoration of the victory at the National Eisteddfod.—The famous Moritz Wurm Orchestra made their first appearance at Cardiff on November 10. They were assisted by Miss Edith Bingham Hall.—A new Cardiff Orchestral Society has recently been formed, under the conductorship of Mr. Garforth Mortimer.

CHICHESTER.—A Wagner Centenary concert was given by the Orchestral Society on October 30, under the direction of Mr. F. J. W. Crowe. A number of familiar excerpts were given. Mr. Hermann Hill played Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, and Miss Amy Simpson sang.

MELBOURNE.—A creditable performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given by the Victorian Festival Chorus on August 11. Mr. J. J. Bailey conducted, and the solo parts were taken by Miss Eileen O'Brien, Miss Violet Somerset, Mr. E. E. Hooke, and Mr. Horace Stevens.

NEWTON ABBOT.—The concert given by the Newton Abbot Wesleyan Church Choir on November 6 was highly successful. The chief work in the programme, Barnby's 'Rebekah,' was performed with certainty and expressive effect under Mr. Coleridge D. White's conductorship. The choir also showed good powers of sonority in choruses from 'Elijah' and Handel's oratorios. The soloists of the occasion were Miss E. Pascho, Mr. Alfred Wills, and Mr. J. B. Martin.

READING.—The Misses Fife opened a further series of chamber concerts at the Town Hall on November 17. Mr. Hans Wessely, Miss Eveline Fife, Miss Dorothy Jones, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, and Miss Katherine Eggar played a Pianoforte quintet by Miss Eggar, and the four string players gave Dohnányi's Quartet in D flat. Songs were contributed by Miss Pattie Hornsby. It is gratifying to note that these concerts are prospering, as is shown in the fact that four instead of three concerts per year are to be given in the present and future seasons.

WARRINGTON.—The Musical Society gave an interesting miscellany concert on November 12, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Crossley. Percy Fletcher's 'The Deacon's Masterpiece,' the principal work in the programme, was performed creditably, and still better qualities were shown in various part-songs, including German's 'My bonny lass, she smileth' and Fanning's 'Our Island home.' The orchestra played independent numbers, and the soloists were Miss Eva Rich and Mr. Norman Allin.

WORKING.—The works chosen for performance by the Musical Society this season are Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night,' a concert-selection of Gounod's 'Faust,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon Suite,' and for the orchestra, Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony. The conductor is Mr. Patrick White.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

The first concert given at La Société de Zoologie was devoted to works by Willem De Mol and Paul Gilson, two national composers of great merit. The programme included the first part of 'Les quatre âges,' an oratorio by De Mol, and 'Francesca de Rimini,' a lyric by Gilson.

BERLIN.

Ferruccio Busoni has just completed a new orchestral work, entitled 'Sinfonisches Nocturne.' This Nocturne, and a new Pianoforte concerto by the same distinguished composer, will be produced here in February, 1914.—The first chamber music concert of the Trio, Marie Soldat-Röger, Fanny Davies, and Pablo Casals, will take place on December 10 at the Königliche-Hochschule für Musik.—Humperdinck's new opera, 'Die Marketenderin,' is to be produced at the Royal Opera House on December 31, 1913.—August Strindberg's fairy-play, 'Die Kronbräut,' with music by August Enna, the eminent Danish composer, has been successfully presented for the first time under Herr Enna's direction.—A concert given by the Royal Court and the Cathedral Choir is always an event of public interest. The prominent features of the last programme were Bach's Motet 'Singet dem Herrn,' and Caldara's melodious 'Regina Coeli.'—During next spring the Philharmonic Orchestra will give a first hearing of Franz Mikorey's 'Sinfonia engadina,' under the composer's direction.—Two highly interesting novelties are on the programme of the Sinfonia-Verein. These are Max Bruch's latest work, a Concerto for clarinet and viola with orchestra, and a Serenade for orchestra by Robert Kahn.—During the season Saint-Saëns's opera 'Proserpine' is to be performed for the first time at the Deutsche Oper.—A great music festival devoted entirely to Swedish music is planned by M. Marteau. The event will take place in the spring of 1915.—Bach's solo-cantata, 'Mein Herz schwimmt in Blut' (discovered by M. Martienssen at the Royal Library, Copenhagen), is to be sung for the first time at the Luther-Kirche.—An important sale of autographs, including fragments and manuscripts by Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Liszt, Verdi, and Wagner, was announced to be held by Leo Liepmannssohn on November 21-22.—A highly interesting sketch-book of Beethoven, hitherto unknown, was recently sold with other autographs and documents left by Ignace Moscheles, the famous composer and pianist. This sketch-book, containing among other good things the first detailed draft of the 'Missa solennis' (Op. 123, in D), was at first in the possession of Aloys Fuchs, who bought it at the sale of Beethoven's belongings at Vienna in 1827. In 1830, Aloys Fuchs presented the sketch-book to Mendelssohn as a token of friendship. In 1832 Mendelssohn gave the precious relic to Moscheles.—The 'Lohengrin' house referred to in a recent number is not to be sold to the Berlin butcher. The King and the Prince of Saxony have taken an interest in the matter. The house is to be bought by a rich music-lover of Dresden, and the building to be formed into a Wagner Museum.—Prof. Georg Schumann, the distinguished director of the Berliner Singakademie, has been selected president of the Academical Master-school for Composition.—'Die Musik seit Richard Wagner' is the title of a new work by Dr. Walter Niemann, just published by Schuster & Loeffler, that promises to be of great interest.

BREMEN.

Max Reger's 'Ballet Suite,' recently produced here under Prof. Ernst Wendel's baton, met with a very great success. Under the same direction, V. Reifner's Burlesque-symphonique, 'Die Bremer Stadtmusikanten' (The Waits of Bremen), will be produced here during the season.—At the Town-Theatre Felix Weingartner's opera 'Genesius' was accorded an enthusiastic reception.

BRESLAU.

After its great success at Paris, New York, and in London, Moussorgsky's chef d'œuvre, the popular drama 'Boris Godounoff,' has been given at the Municipal Theatre of Breslau for the first time in Germany. The work was enthusiastically received.

BRUSSELS.

César Franck's chef d'œuvre, 'Les Béatitudes,' is announced for the fourth concert of the Conservatoire royal de Musique.—Vincent d'Indy's ballet 'Istar' and Raoul Gunsbourg's opera 'Venise' were recently given for the first time at the Théâtre de la Monnaie.

CASSEL.

G. Ferrari's lyrical-drama, 'Le Cobzar,' will be performed for the first time in Germany on November 22 at the Kaiserliches Hoftheater. The libretto is by Vacaresco and Paul Milliet.

COLOGNE.

At the opening of the Musico-historic Museum, founded by Wilhelm Heyer, a very interesting historical concert took place. The programme included works by Bernardo Pasquini, Milandre, Bach, Bull, Handel, and Rameau, performed on old instruments. The soloists were Madame Wanda Landowska (the celebrated clavecinist), N. Vogel (Amsterdam), A. von Nette (Brussels), and G. Kimsy (the conservator of the Museum).—Heinrich Marschner's famous opera, 'Templer und Jüdin' (produced in 1829 at Leipzig) has been successfully revived at the Opera in Pitzner's version, under the direction of Walter Gaertner.—The opera 'Fennimore,' by Frederick Delius, will be produced here during the season.

DÜREN (RHINELAND).

The recently discovered ballad 'Scholastika,' by Karl Loewe (the world-renowned ballad-composer), will be produced at the second concert of the Konzert-Gesellschaft.

FRANKFURT.

At a recent concert Berlioz's 'Symphonie Fantastique,' followed by the same composer's 'Lelio,' achieved a great success under Mengelberg's baton, with Dr. Ludwig Wüllner as soloist.—'Der Zwerg und die Infantin' (The Dwarf and the Infanta), a dance-play in two tableaux by Bernard Sekles, has been successfully produced at the Opera House by Dr. Rottenburg.

LEIPSIK.

F. Mikorey has written a new work entitled 'Sinfonia Engadina' (a glorification of the Engadin Mountains), for two mixed choruses, two children choruses, and soli, organ, and orchestra.—A Brahms manuscript (38 pages), containing among other songs, eight unpublished Lieder, has been discovered among the documents left by the well-known music enthusiast, Alfred Bovet. The word 'Lieder' on the title-page is in the autograph of Clara Schumann.

MILAN.

Maestro Enrico Bossi, the well-known Italian composer and organist, has just finished his new opera 'Jeanne d'Arc.' A concert-performance of this work will be given on January 20, 1914, at Cologne (Gürzenich Concert), under Fritz Steinbach. The libretto is based on the historical studies on 'L'héroïne de Vaucouleurs,' recently published in France.—The biography of Verdi, by Monaldi, has just been issued. This splendid publication contains, besides numerous new facts concerning the life of the great master, a series of portraits of his friends and of the interpreters of his works, and will prove of immense interest to the musical world.

MUNICH.

'Fragment einer unvollendeten Oper, 'Die Hochzeit' von Richard Wagner,' is the title of a manuscript recently discovered among the documents left by Felix Mottl. The manuscript is dated Würzburg, March 1, 1833, the year when Wagner presented this fragment to the Würzburger-Musikverein. He was at the time choirmaster to the town.

NICE.

'Beatrice,' the new opera by André Messager, will be produced here in March, 1914.—H. Leroux has written an operetta, 'The daughter of Figaro' (a kind of continuation of Mozart's 'Figaro'). It is rumoured that this work is to be produced at Paris during this season.

Music in France and Russia is dealt with on pp. 818-19.

Miscellaneous.

The work of the English Folk-Dance Society has so increased that it has necessitated a change of office to 73, Avenue Chambers, Vernon Place, Bloomsbury (secretary, Mrs. Huxtable). Among the recent lecture-demonstrations given by Mr. Sharp and members of the Society are: at Nottingham, November 1, afternoon to members of the Frœbel Society, and evening to Lady Boot's employees; Leicester, November 8, in the afternoon; Market Harboro', November 8, in the evening; Radley, Oxford, November 15; Clapton, November 25; Wood Green, November 29. Folk-song lectures were given by Mr. Sharp at Roehampton on November 5, Lincoln on November 6, and Holloway College on November 7. Forthcoming events are a Members' Country Dance Ball on December 4 at Chelsea Polytechnic, Manresa Road, and the Christmas Holiday Session at Stratford-on-Avon, December 27 to January 4.

One of the interesting matinée entertainments periodically given at Miss von Etlinger's School of Opera took place on November 11. Miss Evelyn Althaus and Miss Cecily Derrick were again the chief performers, appearing as principals in the second Act of 'Hänsel und Gretel.' A talk by Miss Margaret Halstan and a performance by Miss Ruby Ginner and her pupils helped to make up an attractive programme.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society met on October 20, for the purpose of testifying their appreciation of Mr. Munro Davison's services as conductor of the choir, which post he recently resigned. The presentation took the form of a handsome antique grandfather clock, made by the famous craftsmen Mudge & Dutton in 1760.

Mr. Thomas Beecham has promised to co-operate next summer, at Glastonbury, in the production of 'The birth of Arthur,' a choral-drama by Reginald Buckley and Rutland Boughton. Portions of this work have been performed in various places, notably at Bournemouth last summer, when a whole scene was given under the peculiar conditions required by the composer.

We learn with gratification that the music of Mr. Cyril Scott is making headway on the Continent. The pianist, Count Visconti, is making a feature of Mr. Scott's work on his tour in Italy; the Violin and Pianoforte sonata has recently been played at Leipzig, and a new Quintet has been given at Vienna. Mr. Scott's choral work, 'The Nativity Hymn,' will be produced at Vienna on April 3 next.

Under Miss Nellie Chaplin's guidance an entertainment that never failed to interest or to charm was given at Æolian Hall on October 29. The plan of the programme was of the kind that Miss Chaplin had previously made familiar. Dancers, viol-players, singers, flautist, and oboist played their part, and Miss Chaplin was usually busy at the virginal or harpsichord.

Dr. R. R. Terry gave an exceedingly interesting lecture on 'The romance of musical notation' to a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at the Regent Street Polytechnic on November 8. He made an appeal to all who are able to help in the work of transcribing old English musical manuscripts.

The music chosen for practice by the Balham Orchestral Society, under Mr. Allan Brown, during the season includes Haydn's D minor Symphony, German's 'Coronation March,' Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture, and Thomas's 'Mignon' Overture.

Four extremely interesting lectures on the 'Music and Musical Instruments of the ancient eastern civilizations' were given by Miss Kathleen Schlesinger at the British Museum on October 22, 29, November 5 and 12.

The songs by Marx mentioned in our November issue, page 753, as having been sung by Madame Jessie Brett-Young, were by Joseph, not Adolph Marx.

In our review of Dr. Alcock's 'Marche Triomphale' (p. 733, November), the word 'Duke' should have been Prince Arthur.

Mr. Ernest G. White gave a lecture entitled, 'Science and singing,' at Queen's (small) Hall, on November 3.

Mr. Wilhelm Ganz celebrated his eightieth birthday on November 6.

Dr. C. H. Lloyd intends to resign the post of musical instructor at Eton College next Easter.

Answers to Correspondents.

A. W. would be glad to know if there was a Funeral March played at Queen Mary's execution. Our correspondent heard 'an old lady play a march, which she learned when a child (over sixty years ago), the name of it being "Funeral March played at Queen Mary's execution." Part of it resembles Highland music.'

B. C. G.—Schumann's 'Du bist wie eine Blume' is published (as part of the 'Myrthen' song-cycle, price 1s. 6d.) by Messrs. Novello. The same firm publish, in their 'Orpheus' Series, the male-voice quartet you are in search of. It is by Charles Wood.

A. K.—Korngold appears to be the Peter Pan of music, for he won't grow up. When first mentioned in these columns, in June, 1910, he was thirteen years old. Last month he was announced as fourteen.

P. L.—Mr. Louis Schloesser's personal reminiscences of Beethoven (translated by his son, the late Adolf Schloesser) were published in the Musical Times for April and May, 1894 (Nos. 614 and 615).

NORTHERNER.—A list of the musical settings of Tennyson's poems would fill pages of our Journal. Novello & Co. will send you a list of those they publish if you apply for it.

T. VON L.—The letters of Clementi do not appear to have been published in the Musical Times. Perhaps one of our readers might be able to help in tracing them.

JONES.—The tune you quote (or rather misquote, for F E D should be F C A) is sung in the garden scene of Gounod's 'Faust.'

Complete edition, bound with HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN (Quarto), 6s. 6d. net.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 801, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

FALSTAFF

SYMPHONIC-STUDY

IN C MINOR, WITH TWO INTERLUDES IN A MINOR
FOR FULL ORCHESTRA.

BY EDWARD ELGAR

OP. 68.

MINIATURE SCORE,

PAPER, 7s. 6d.; CLOTH, 10s. 6d.

FULL SCORE AND ORCHESTRAL PARTS ON HIRE.

THE TIMES.

We get again the Elgar of the brilliant "Cockaigne" Overture, of the "Pomp and Circumstance" and "Coronation" Marches. There is an abundance of highly original orchestration, and the whole is moulded with a stronger hand than these are earlier and smaller works.

THE TELEGRAPH.

It is certainly the most elaborate of Elgar's works so far. . . . It is on every page the hand and the voice of Elgar, who speaks with no uncertainty: in a vein of quaint humour, as when Falstaff sleeps; of rare beauty and charm, as in the interludes; and even more in the exquisite closing scene of the fall and death of Falstaff. . . . Elgar has given us a masterpiece of music, prodigiously stamped with his own remarkable personality.

THE MORNING POST.

Sir Edward Elgar's music is a remarkable example of his powers presented in a light hitherto unknown. He frankly enters the field of programme music and does so with immediate success. . . . As a musical illustration of a Shakespeare character it is one of the most remarkable scores produced. . . . Apart from its fidelity to the particular aspect of Falstaff offered by the play it has great value as music, and that value is found in the fact that the composer reveals an expansion of style and a great quality of beauty and charm. . . . The work, very finely played under the composer's guidance, marks an advance in Sir Edward Elgar's art, and constitutes a valuable addition to Shakespeare music whose worth cannot fail to be recognised.

THE DAILY GRAPHIC.

The design of his Symphonic Study is masterly in its breadth and decision, and no elaboration of detail is permitted to obscure the main outline of the structure. It falls into four main divisions, broken by two interludes, which, while still forming a material part of the development, come as a welcome relief to what might otherwise prove too breathless, a rush of incident. . . . The opening section is a lax miracle of life and gaiety. We are in the midst of a wit combat of bewildering dexterity. The themes fly backward and forward like tennis balls across a net. So rapid is the repartee that one positively gasps for breath. . . . At the right moment comes the first interlude, in which the Knight is wafted in dreams back to boyhood and sees himself once more a slim page. The delicate charm of this passage defies description. . . . It must be said that Elgar has written a masterpiece which does equal honour to himself and to the land that bred him.

THE DAILY MAIL.

It is the work of a man arrived at consummate mastery of his means, who has contrived a speech that exactly expresses him. . . . The new "Falstaff" has an animation in its succession of scenes of tavern revelry, highway robbery and warfare, broken only by the two little interludes gracefully hinting at old dance movements, that cannot surely for long fail to exhilarate all hearers.

THE DAILY NEWS.

"Falstaff" shows us Elgar in a new light. Though his personality is still unmistakable, he has got nearer than ever before to the school of which Strauss is the chief representative. The themes are expressive and richly humorous and pathetic. . . . The whole work is full of wonderfully rich and novel orchestration and happy touches of musical psychology, and it is finely proportioned.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

The chief theme, in spite of its ponderous accents, is a little featureless, but another phrase representing the boasting side of his [Falstaff's] character is a capital one, of real humour, and cleverly treated by the composer. But the purely pictorial element is of rather stronger calibre than the psychology, and in the next section, where the revelries of Falstaff and the Prince are described, the music is extremely brilliant and brimming over with merriment, the orchestration having many deft touches of humour. . . . The orchestration of "Falstaff" deserves more than a word or two. Elgar has always had a wonderful command of instrumentation, especially in tone-colour, but in this latest work he has surpassed himself. Every instrument has a virtuoso part, and the brilliance and mastery of the writing, its amazing richness and variety in colour and effect, are remarkable.

EVENING NEWS.

"Falstaff" is a work of the utmost charm and interest and a notable achievement on the part of the composer. In one respect, its instrumentation, it is still more remarkable, for the orchestra is handled with a brilliance and mastery which few composers could equal.

THE MYSTIC TRUMPETER

POEM

BY

WALT WHITMAN.

SET TO MUSIC

FOR BARITONE SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

HAMILTON HARTY.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

TONIC SOL-FA (in the Press).

THE TIMES.

Mr. Harty's cantata, "The Mystic Trumpeter," has a directness which engages one's sympathy at once. The composer shows considerable skill in the management of simple effect, and behind the effect there is sincere feeling.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Harty's setting may find an honoured place in the repertory of many a provincial choral society. It is in no wise difficult, considering the present state of choral technique, and the choruses are effective alike for singer and hearer. . . . He gives us moments of striking beauty, and often rises to a height of real poetry.

THE MORNING POST.

Mr. Hamilton Harty has treated his theme with much freshness and resource. He gives proof of his command of fancy and contrivance, yet he loses none of the charm that always distinguishes his music. The description of Paradise is of entrancing beauty, and the picture of the Crusaders lives in graphic tints. In dealing with the love section he is tender beyond imagination, and his climax of joy is spontaneous and unrestrained, giving the exact note the verse requires.

THE STANDARD.

Mr. Harty clothes all in harmonies that remove them from the commonplace. Never for a moment is he at a loss for an appropriate figure or phrase; indeed, it is his ready command of ways and means that is perhaps the most striking feature of the music. The work should find high favour with choral societies all over the kingdom.

THE DAILY MAIL.

"The Mystic Trumpeter" calls for a variety of picturesque illustrations; indeed, it is his ready command of ways and means that is perhaps the most striking feature of the music. The work should find high favour with choral societies all over the kingdom.

THE DAILY NEWS.

The choral writing of "The Mystic Trumpeter" is such as Yorkshire loves, and the singers revelled in the broad phrases and strong harmonies. Mr. Harty's meaning is never in doubt. He has seized on the salient characteristics of each section with unerring instinct, and if he does not stop to consider the subtler shades of meaning, the poem is one which calls for broad treatment rather than ultra delicacy.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

Mr. Harty has seized the musical possibilities of the text with great skill, and produced a series of inspiring mood-pictures with a refreshing youthfulness about them which is sure to make the work popular.

THE YORKSHIRE POST.

There is nothing tentative about Mr. Harty's score, every effect is assured, every passage sounds well. The appeal he makes is instantaneous, partly, no doubt, because the pictures presented by the poet are obvious enough to require no very great subtlety of treatment, but in a greater measure because of the transparent clearness of the effects. For this reason, and because of the genuine picturesque charm of the work, one is pretty certain that it will be taken up by not a few choral societies.

WHAT IS MUSIC?

By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM.

With a Frontispiece in Photogravure.

Many people who love music would stumble if they were asked this question: "What is Music?" They could not answer. Mr. Statham, who is well known for several books on musical subjects, puts the question and answers it clearly, illustrating his meaning throughout by references to the great composers and by extracts from their works.

No. 65.

THE HALIFAX MADRIGAL SOCIETY'S COMMAND PERFORMANCE AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

As recorded in our last issue, the Halifax Madrigal Society gained the chief prize offered at the recent Blackpool Festival. This blue ribbon in the choral competition world they also gained at the two previous Festivals (1911, 1912), and thus they have established a record. It must be remembered that each year they have been pitted against many of the finest small choirs in the whole Kingdom. This achievement was brought to the notice of His Majesty The King, with the result that on November 21 the choir was commanded to appear at Windsor Castle to sing before Their Majesties and the royal guests from Austria. The programme had to be submitted immediately, and the president of the Society, Mr. T. W. Benson, was summoned to Windsor to make all the necessary arrangements. Rehearsals were held every evening until the 19th. The choir travelled to London on the morning of the 21st, and after a brief rest at the Imperial Hotel, Russell Square, journeyed to Windsor, arriving at 8.30 p.m. Carriages conveyed the party to the Castle, and by 9.30 the choir were assembled in the beautiful Waterloo Chamber. There was no platform and no seating accommodation. The Royal party and their attendants came into the apartment soon after 10 p.m., and the following programme was sung with little or no pause:

- Madrigal { 'Yield up your ancient fame' } Luca ('Cedon l'Antiche') Marenzio
- Choral piece (acc.) 'Sleepless dreams' Ethel Smyth
- Part-song ... 'Cargoes' Balfour Gardiner
- Descriptive } 'The mad fire-rider' Hugo Wolf chorus (acc.)
- Choral song ... 'Nocturne' Granville Bantock
- Choral song 'Morning song of praise' Max Bruch
- Madrigal... 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' ... Wilbye
- { 'Lord, lovely hast Thou made my dear' ('Dieu! qu'il la fait bon regarder')
Part-songs { 'Cold winter, villain that thou art' ('Yver, vous n'êtes qu'un villain') } Debussy
- Choral song 'On Jordan's banks' Max Bruch
- Part-song 'Since first I saw your face' ... Ford
- Harmonized air... 'Annie Laurie' { Arr. by Granville Bantock
- National } ... 'God save the (Arr. by Edward anthem) King' { Elgar

There was no other music. The performance lasted about an hour, after which Mr. Benson and Mr. Shepley were presented to The King and The Queen, who expressed their satisfaction with the concert.

The occasion is not one for criticism, but it may be said that the Society fully maintained its very high reputation. The full choir of 89 voices (sopranos, 27; altos, 20; tenors, 18; basses, 24) attended. Dr. McNaught was present as conductor-in-reserve. A sumptuous repast was afterwards served to the choir, and at about 11.30 they were conveyed to the railway station, where a crowd of residents awaited to see them off. Before starting the choir gave a splendid performance of 'On Jordan's banks,' and at midnight the special train left for London. On the next day the choir visited Westminster Abbey and other of the interesting sights of London. A time to be remembered and discussed for the rest of their lives!

On November 20, the night before the visit to Windsor, Mr. Benson and Mr. Shepley were the guests of the London Madrigal Society, at the first dinner and practice of the season. Mr. Lionel H. Franceys, honorary secretary of the Blackpool Festival, was also present as the guest of Dr. McNaught.

KEIGHLEY.—October 25 and November 1.

The annual competition gathering known as the 'Summerscales' Competitions was held successfully in spite of electoral turmoil. The first day was fully occupied by the work of the children. The chief prize for class-singing went to Bradford Heaton Church Day School (Mr. J. H. Wilkinson) for the best performances of Parker's 'An evensong' and Hatton's 'Jack Frost.' Brunswick Street, Nelson (Mr. H. Whitaker), were first in a class for Band of Hope choirs, &c., and Queen's Road C.S. were first in a sight-reading test. The successful solo competitors were Harry Frear and Florence Adelaide Taylor for singing, Frank H. Noble (junior class) and Joseph Butterworth (senior class) for violin-playing.

Two contests for adult choirs that had not previously won a first-prize were decided on this day. The successful entrants were Bradford Philharmonic Society (Mr. C. Milne Rook) among mixed-voice choirs, and Batley Liberal Club among male-voice choirs.

The principal event at the second meeting was the Challenge Shield class for mixed-voice choirs. The first- and second-prizes were taken by Keighley Vocal Union (Mr. W. H. Whitaker) and Bradford Vocal Union (Mr. J. Barker). Keighley Vocal Union were also first in the sight-reading test and the class for ladies' voices. The winning male-voice choir was Todmorden (Mr. Harold Lees). Craven Quartet, Silsden, were best out of six parties. The prizes for solo-singing were won by Miss Gladys Peel (contralto) and Mr. J. W. Widdop (tenor). Miss Peel and Mr. H. Thomas (tenor) were the best sight-readers.

The adjudicators were Miss Edith Robinson and Dr. Bairstow at the first meeting, and Dr. Bairstow alone at the second.

NOTTINGHAM.—October 25.

This Festival is continually expanding in usefulness. As will be seen from the list of choral entries we give, the area of its appeal is a wide one. The adjudicators were: Dr. W. G. McNaught, Mr. Harry Evans, Mr. Granville Humphreys, Madame Edith Hands, Mr. C. Rawdon-Briggs and Mr. Bernard Johnson.

A welcome feature of this Festival is the singing of the test-pieces by the combined choirs. Mr. Charles E. Riley conducted with his usual alertness and ability.

HASTINGS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—October 27 to 29.

This Festival, now in its fifth year, has grown from year to year, and it is satisfactory to note that the public interest has increased. In the opinion of Dr. Charlton Palmer, a higher level of excellence was reached this year than on any previous occasion. This may be taken as evidence of the good work which the Festival inspires, and should be a great encouragement to its promoters. A Prize composition, a part-song set to words selected by the committee, 'There is beauty on the mountain,' was won by Dr. Herman Brearley, a highly-esteemed local professor. A challenge shield that was offered for competition for mixed-voice choirs of fifty voices attracted entries from Folkestone, Eastbourne, and Hastings, and was won by the Hastings Madrigal Society. In the female-voice choir class, this Society also won the first-prize. Miss Ruth Smith was successful in the gold medal class for previous winners, and the Ore Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. Fred. Shoesmith, were the winners in the class for male-voice choirs.

In addition to Dr. Charlton Palmer, the other adjudicators were Mr. Eaton Fanning, Mr. Dan Price, Mrs. Knatchbull (Miss Dora Bright), Madame Alice Toothill, Miss Florence Aylward, Mr. W. F. Freeman, Mr. George Wilby, and Mrs. Cameron Taylor.

The hon. secretaries, Lady Vere Isham and Mr. J. B. Lockey, on whom the chief burden of the organization of the Festival fell, are to be congratulated on the success of their efforts.

The success which has attended this Festival should go a long way in stimulating enthusiasm on the South Coast, where zeal in cultivating the musical art seems to progress somewhat slowly when compared with the vigour shown in some of the northern counties.

BARROW.—November 6, 7, 8.

This Festival as usual produced some results of the very highest worth. The competitions were well attended by choirs and listeners, and keen interest was shown. The adjudicators were Mr. Harry Evans and Mr. J. E. Adkins. Below we summarise the chief results:

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Song of Proserpine' (Coleridge-Taylor).

'Cargoes' (Balfour Gardiner).

1st. Barrow Madrigal Society.

2nd. Carnforth.

3rd. Haverigg and Millom.

Bradford Philharmonic.

The choir last mentioned were first in a special competition for madrigal singing, in which the test was 'So saith my fair,' by Luca Marenzio.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (five entries).

Tests: 'Into the silent land' (Arthur Foote).

'The sailor's return' (Percy Fletcher).

1st. Lancaster.

2nd. Barrow Madrigal Society.

Four female-voice choirs, of which Barrow St. James's Choir were the best, sang Bantock's 'To the evening star,' and Schumann's 'The forest fay.'

There are also competitions for local choral societies, in which the prizes were won by King's Hall Choir (mixed voices), Millom (male voices), and Millom Wesley Guild (Girls' Friendly Societies).

In the chief competition for junior choirs, Askam Senior Council School gained first place. Two choirs competing in the singing of the Cantata, 'Mice in council' (W. McNaught) gave a combined performance under Mr. Harry Evans.

The chief solo prize-winners were Miss May Robinson (soprano), Miss Doris Young (contralto), Mr. Horace Bennett (tenor), Mr. G. W. Horne (baritone), and Mr. Cecil Rhodes (bass), Miss Frances M. Casson (pianoforte), and Miss Ethel Richmond (violin).

STOCKSBRIDGE.—November 1 and 15.

The annual competitions were brought to a musical and financial success, although the choral section was not well supported on the whole. The first-prizes in the choral classes were as follows:

JUNIOR CHOIRS (Open).

Abbeydale (Girls) C.S. (Miss Watkinson).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Local).

Stocksbridge Choral Union (Dr. W. M. Robertshaw).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

SOUTHEND AND SOUTH-EAST ESSEX MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—November 8 to 15.

This Festival is now in its third year. The choral entries on this occasion were not numerous, but these deficiencies were amply made up by the entries in other classes. The programme of tests was a very good one, there being no shoddy music. The audiences were large, and generally much life and interest were exhibited. The following were the chief results:

PIANOFORTE SOLO.

(For candidates aged 16 and 17 years.)

1st. Miss Gladys Shrapnel.

VIOLIN SOLO.

(For candidates aged 18 years and upwards.)

1st. John H. Haigh.

VOCAL SOLOS.

1st. Girls, Josephine Swift.

1st. Boys, Archibald Sloman.

1st. Soprano, Miss Ivy G. Boyle.

1st. Mezzo-Soprano, Miss Gertrude Fishleigh.

1st. Soprano (2nd song), Miss Ethel Beale.

1st. Contralto, Miss Minnie R. Brown.

1st. Baritone, Mr. Arthur Seton.

1st. Bass, Mr. Frank W. Harvey.

CHURCH CHOIRS OF MIXED VOICES.

Tests: 'He watching over Israel (Mendelssohn).

'Fierce was the wild billow' (Tertius Noble).

St. George's Presbyterian (Miss E. Duniam Jones).

1st. Crowstone Congregational (Mr. H. J. Teakle).

Park Road Wesleyan (Mr. Philip H. Kessell).

All these choirs showed good training. The winning choir was well equipped and disciplined. In the Mendelssohn chorus they sang too slowly, but in other points they were excellent.

CHAIR EISTEDDFOD IN LONDON AT CENTRAL HALL, WESTMINSTER.—November 20.

London does not often have a chance of witnessing a 'Chair' Eisteddfod. The event arranged at the new and commodious Central Hall, Westminster (erected by the Wesleyan body) afforded this opportunity. The 'chairing,' however, is not to do with music: it is the reward of a successful bard. The Festival, if we may use the word, was an extraordinary success in drawing choirs from the provinces, more especially from Wales.

In the male-voice choir section there came the New Siloh Choir, the Ebbw Vale Male Choir, the Cleveland Harmonic Male Choir, the Midsomer Norton Choir, the Bargoed Choir, the Llanelly Choir, the Williamstown Choir, the Wren Male Choir, the Tonyrefail Choir, and the Margam Glee Society from Port Talbot. The test-piece was Dard-Janin's 'Peace and War.' Cleveland was first.

In the mixed-voice section ten choirs competed—the Penygraig Music Lovers, the Cambrian Harmonic Society, the New Jewin Choir, the Woolwich Co-operative Choral Society, the Camberwell Choral Society, the Willesden and District Choir, the Carmarthen Young Choristers' Glee Society, the Essendine Choir, the Finchley Presbyterian Church Choral Society, and the Llansamlet Choral Society. The test-piece was 'Efe a ddaw' ('The Lord shall come'), by Iughe Evans.

The prize went to the Woolwich Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. John Hines), with 93 marks, Finchley coming next with 89, and Camberwell third with 88. So gallant Wales was defeated, not even being placed.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—November 22.

This wonderfully successful event was promoted by Mr. Granville Humphreys on behalf of the Crystal Palace management. Many people shook their heads when it was proposed to hold competitions in such an arena in the month of November. But the optimism of Mr. Humphreys was, as the event proved, thoroughly justified, and even he was surprised at the response made by competitors, no fewer than 2,000 being drawn from a very wide area. The chief results were as follows:

PIANOORTE.

Open Class (Seniors).

- 1st. Miss D. Augusta Chilton-Griffin.

VIOLIN SOLOS.

- 1st. Ruth Pedersen.

Open Class.

- 1st. Miss W. Joan Clare.

VOCAL SOLOS (Open).

- 1st. Soprano, Miss Amy Knightly.
1st. Mezzo-Soprano, Miss Eleanor A. Gillespie.
1st. Contralto, Miss Elsie Rohm.
1st. Tenor, Mr. Sidney Pointer.
1st. Baritone, Mr. Howard Fry.
1st. Bass, Mr. John H. Hummel.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

- Tests: 'How merrily we live' (Michael Este).
'Soul-star' (Granville Bantock).

- 2nd. The Willesden District Choir (Mr. J. S. Waddell).
3rd. Essendine Ladies' Choir, Willesden, N. (Mr. William Kendall).
1st. Boots' Ladies' Choir, Nottingham (Mr. C. E. Riley). (Nine choirs competed.)

CHURCH OR CHAPEL CHOIRS.

- Test: 'O that I knew' (Bennett).

- 1st. High Street Wesleyan Church, Clapham (Mr. Wesley Hammet).
2nd. Britannia Row Congregational Church, Holloway, N. (Mr. A. G. Carver).

MIXED-VOICE QUARTET (Open).

- Test: 'Come, sweet morning' (Arranged by A. L.)

- 1st. The Nafford Quartet, Birmingham.

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

- Tests: 'Weary wind of the west' (Elgar).
'Since first I saw your face' (Thomas Ford).

- Sutton Musical Society (Mr. P. W. H. Carpenter).
Penge and Beckenham Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. Percy A. Bullmann).
Woolwich Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. John Hines).
The Willesden District Choir (Mr. J. S. Waddell).

- 2nd. Essendine Choir, Willesden (Mr. William Kendall).
The Pearl Choir, Chelsea (Mr. Charles Smith).
Camberwell Choral Society (Mr. W. J. Hooper).
1st. Vineyard Choir, Richmond (Mrs. Nelly Lyne).
Albion Hall Choir (late Queen's Road, N.E.) (Mr. Walter Penn).
Excelsior Choir, Chelmsford (Mrs. T. H. Waller).
3rd. The Manfield Choir, Northampton (Mr. W. F. Marshman).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

- Tests: 'Feasting I watch' (Elgar).

- 'Hymn before action' (Walford Davies).

- 3rd. Excelsior Male-Voice Choir, Chelmsford (Mrs. T. H. Waller).
1st. Coventry Musical Club Male-Voice Choir (Mr. John Chapman).
2nd. Essendine Male-Voice Choir, Willesden, N. (Mr. W. Kendall). (Seven choirs competed.)

The adjudicators were Dr. W. G. McNaught, Mr. Visetti, Mr. Dan Price, Mr. Russell Bonner, Mr. Percy E. Fletcher, and Mr. S. Filmer Rook.

NEW JEWIN EISTEDDFOD, ALDERSGATE STREET, LONDON.

The annual Eisteddfod was held on November 6, and attracted a large number of competitors. The standard of the solo items was exceptionally high. The choral prize was won by the Fann Street Choir, conducted by Mr. Thomas. Dr. Caradog Roberts adjudicated.

LEIGH (LANCS).—October 24, 25.

The juniors competed on the first day and the adults on the second day. The chief choral prize was won by the Leigh P.M. Choir. In the class confined to Wesleyan Choirs five choirs competed, and the prize was awarded to Earlestown Wesleyan Choir. The adjudicators were Dr. Caradog Roberts and Mr. H. Dauber.

THE MYTH AGAIN.

In our September issue we stated that no evidence had reached us to support the assertion that had been made (in The Choir) that 'it is a fact that some choirmasters and soloists prepare their music for competitions not in accordance with the composer's intentions so much as to suit the known vagaries and preferences of the adjudicators for the time being.' Now, notwithstanding a vague statement by Mr. Rutland Boughton, an entertaining and quite nicely-written article by Mr. Gerald Cumberland—whose opinion on the equator would be as interesting and as relevant to the issue—and an editorial in the November number of The Choir, we are still uninformed, and, therefore, incredulous. Not a single scrap of honest, straightforward evidence has been brought forward to prove that competitors deliberately ignore composers' intentions in order to satisfy the vagaries of adjudicators and that they win prizes by so doing. The present writer has been closely associated for many years with all the best-known adjudicators in the Kingdom. Familiar as he is with all their ways and outlook on musical interpretation, he declares that he would be puzzled to know how to proceed with the preparation of, say, the Morecambe tests for next year in order to meet the assumed peculiar views of any one of his fellow adjudicators. Yet we are told of wonderful conductors who are able to project their knowledge of 'vagaries,' and the precise amount of violence to a composer's intentions that will be approved, into the interpretation of new pieces! On this outrageous theory the said vagaries are rigid habits, and the calculation of allowable liberties an exact science! Nous ne pensons pas! M.

We have received the Syllabus of the Morecambe Festival (May 5 to 9) and the Report for 1913; also a Syllabus for the Midland (Birmingham) Festival (May 19 to 23), and the Bristol Exhibition Festival (June 3 to July 18). These documents we shall devote special attention to next month.

The junior results of the foregoing competitions are recorded in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

YORK GATE, MARYLEBONE ROAD, N.W.

INSTITUTED, 1822.

INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER, 1830.

Patron: HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

President: H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT AND STRATHEARN, K.G.

PRINCIPAL—SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL MACKENZIE, Mus.D., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.A.M.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC offers to students of both sexes (whether amateur or professional) a thorough training in all branches of music under the most able and distinguished Professors. In addition to receiving individual lessons in the various branches of the Curriculum, students have the advantage of attending the Orchestral, Choral, and Chamber Music Classes, and the weekly Lectures on music and musicians. Evidence of their progress is given at the Fortnightly and Public Concerts and by periodical Operatic and Dramatic Performances.

There are three Terms in the Academic year—viz., the Michaelmas Term, from Michaelmas to Christmas; the Lent Term, from early in January to Easter; and the Midsummer Term, from early in May until the end of July.

The Fee for the ordinary curriculum is 12 Guineas per Term.

A large number of Scholarships and Prizes are founded and are competed for periodically.

Students who show special merit and ability receive the distinction of being elected by the Directors Associates of the Institution, and are thereby entitled to the use after their names of the initials A.R.A.M. Students who distinguish themselves in the musical profession after quitting the Institution may be elected by the Directors Fellows of the Royal Academy of Music, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the initials F.R.A.M.

Subscribers have the privilege of attending the Lectures and Public Concerts and of introducing friends in proportion to the amount of their subscriptions.

An examination of persons trained independently of the Academy is held twice a year—viz., during the Summer and Christmas vacations—successful candidates at which are elected Licentiates of the Academy, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the initials L.R.A.M. The syllabus is issued annually at Easter. Last day for entry for the September Examination, June 30; for the Christmas Examination, October 31.

An examination of persons engaged in the Training of Children's Voices is held in September and during the Christmas Vacation, and a certificate is granted to successful candidates.

A Special Course of Lecture Lessons for Professional Music Teachers has been instituted, to be followed by an Examination for the distinction of Associateship.

Prospectus, entry form, and all further information may be obtained on application.

F. W. RENAUT, Secretary.

C·BECHSTEIN

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING
HIS LATE MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII
HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA

"Your Pianos are—as regards beauty of tone and evenness, precision and delicacy of touch—the acme of what can be produced in this art."

"The Bechstein Piano is the ideal of perfection, and above all other Instruments responds to all the demands of an artist."

D'ALBERT.

"My best teachers and dearest friends are the Bechstein Grands."

GODOWSKY.

"The Bechstein Instrument is, and will remain, the ideal of the artist."

LESCHETITZKY.

"The Bechstein Piano is of the same importance to the pianist as a Stradivarius is to the violinist."

PACHMANN.

"The beauty of tone of a Bechstein Piano I can only compare with that of a Stradivarius String Quartet."

HAROLD BAUER.

"My admiration for your splendid Pianos is unbounded. Both as regards beauty and fullness of tone and perfection of mechanism the Bechstein Piano is unapproachable."

KATHARINE GOODSON.

"The Bechstein Piano is to me the most perfect in the whole world."
